They gave up the idea of coming forth as public lecturers, and got their essays published. The publication yielded nothing. In the meanwhile, they had again saved about £30, and with this and two bolls of oat-meal, they formed the magnificent idea of building a house, which, besides being a good investment of their little capital, might afford an asylum to the old age of their parents, who, like other aged poor people in their circumstances, were, at every term, at the mercy or caprice of their landlord. The house was completed, in a great measure, by the personal labour of John, who—

Left home every morning before five o'clock, travelled three miles, commenced work immediately, and wrought till nearly half-past seven in the evening, with no more rest than was absolutely necessary to swallow his breakfast and dinner. The last of these, indeed, which consisted exclusively of bread, he frequently eat from his pocket, working the whole of the time. He had then to travel three miles back to his home ; and, after having been thus engaged in hard labour and travelling for nearly fifteen hours, it may be believed that he was sufficiently tired before he reached it ; yet day after day the same process was repeated, except during those short intervals when the mason wrought along with him, and then he dropped work at the usual time. Had it not been for a vision of the future which was now before him, it is probable that even he might have shrunk from this dreary task. But, in imagination, he already saw the house finished, the garden enclosed, with the crops put into the ground ; and his father, now venerable from age, walking through it on a fine summer day, or, if he wished for exercise, employed with a hoe in the little enclosure which he would then be able to call his own.

With the exception of the carriage of three cart-loads of lime, everything had been paid ready money. But by this time the last farthing of the £30 was expended—the stock of provisions was completely exhausted—and the author of the following pages was glad to engage in such work as he could find, to procure the necessaries of life for himself and friends, and provide a little money to defray the expense of removing, which had now become inevitable.

On the 9th of November, 1837, he came to that habitation, at the building of which he had toiled so arduously ; and when he heard his father say, " Dear me, John man, I am perfectly surprised to see that great house you have reared up for us," it is probable that he considered himself overpaid for all his labours. From the account just given, the reader will be able to form some idea of his ingenuity in general matters.

This excellent young man was literally killing himself. He appears too to have had singular notions of independence. When a gentleman, to whom the lectures on Practical Economy had been submitted, proposed to solicit a government office for him, and probably a very humble one,

" He declined, determining to try to the last what he could do for himself and his remaining friends by his own unaided industry. I am glad to be able to state this circumstance, which was never known beyond the family circle, and to feel conscious of the most perfect ability to prove its truth, because it serves to show, in a more striking light, the manner in which he could abide by those stern principles of independence which he had adopted, even in the midst of pinching poverty."

It is not easy to imagine how the acceptance of a pub-lie office, the duties of which he was competent to discharge, could have infringed on the sternest principles of independence, unless it had been unworthily obtained. His brother, however, seems to consider the refusal of an exciseman's or tidewater's place, or something of the sort, an act of heroic virtue. But it had never probably been fairly offered, so it was in reality only the employment of a patron's influence, which was declined, at a time of great hardship, and when Bethune's whole savings had been required to defray the expenses of his father's funeral.

At the time at which this offer was made to him he was literally penniless, prevented from earning anything by the deep snow with which the earth was then covered, and, to avoid incurring debts, living upon oatmeal and potatoes, without any addition whatever—not even that of milk. His fare, even when in moderately prosperous circumstances, had all along been the simplest and the cheapest that could possibly be imagined; and upon it he continued to toil on from day to day, and year to year, without trying to obtain, or seeming to desire, more.

But this was not his most imprudent step. Having received the sum of six guineas for a story, and hoping to realize £38 a-year by other works, he formed the rash design of giving up labour, and taking to authorship as his sole means of subsistence. The ignorance of the world, of his deficiencies of education, and the limited extent of his own acquirements which this argues, might lead any one to suspect the soundness of Bethune's judgment; while the dogged resolution with which he betook himself to this new profession, displays the strength of his will. The following we submit as an addition to the Curiosities of Literature:—

He was seldom absent from his papers for a single minute. From a want of proper accommodation, he still adhered to his old custom of writing upon his knee. To this he had been so long habituated, that he had almost lost the power of writing with facility in any other position; but of the exhausting and destructive tendency of that he had adopted, any one may be convinced who will try it for a single day.

His next attempt was a story for one of the magazines; and upon this, though it was not, perhaps, one of his happiest efforts, he had bestowed the very greatest care. I was then engaged in a similar attempt; and while writing, he repeatedly asked me if "I was straining up the steep of excellence?" and said that "he was endeavouring to do so, by analyzing carefully every sentence which he wrote, to see that there was not a single superfluous or inappropriate word in it." He also frequently advised me to bestow more consideration on the subjects with which I was concerned, and try to finish them in the best possible style. On these occasions he always stated, as his reasons for giving such advice, that "in our circumstances, a week, or even a fortnight, of additional time was nothing, if we could only procure an engagement, and the prospect of being able to dispose of future productions." This story, after undergoing considerable alterations, and being greatly abridged, at the suggestion of a literary friend, was accepted in the quarter for which it was intended; but from the circumstance of nothing being given for MS. till it appears in print, it still remains unpaid (April, 1840;) and with its acceptance, the sun of prosperity, which had merely glanced upon its poor author, set to rise no more upon him.

Bethune's changed and sedentary mode of life probably hastened the progress of the disease which was already at work. He died in the autumn of the following year, under the age of thirty years. The narrative of his illness is long, and painfully minute, yet touching from its affectionate simplicity. We may again repeat, that the man is more remarkable than the author; and that it is the blessing and pride of Scotland to possess many such men, and its shame that, with such powers of labour and of intellect, they may be doomed to the lingering yet premature death of John Bethune. After writing verses for fifteen years, we may conclude, that Bethune had done his best, and he has given no indication of very high poetic faculty. He made fair verses, as he built a house or pruned a tree—though neither bred a mason nor a forester—because at first he felt pleasure in composition, and, latterly, because he set himself doggedly to it, and would not be beat. The fallacious and melancholy expectation of subsisting by their pen, has proved fatal to thousands of young men of the most brilliant talents, whom a thorough education fitted for many literary tasks. How much more dangerous, as well as absurd, must the idea be, if entertained by persons in the condition of poor Bethune. And yet it is far from being rare to hear of the small gains of the literary lottery in which Burns (as it is fancied) drew so rich a prize, tempting adventurers very inferior indeed to Bethune, who never seem to take the surpassing genius of Burns into their calculation, nor also the happy or unhappy accidents which attended his first appearance in the Scottish metropolis.

The Life of John Bethune is full of instruction to his young countrymen; for if there be much to emulate, there is also something to avoid.

Since these remarks were put in type, now some time ago, we are glad to find that a second edition of the Memoir and Poems has appeared, warmly recommended to public attention by the poet Montgomery. The book must have the good wishes of every friend of unlettered talent and genuine worth.

Sixteen Years in Chili and Peru. By the retired Governor of Juan Fernandez. 8vo, pp. 563. Fisher and Son.

Captain Thomas Sutcliffe, who appears to have started, as a military adventurer—a soldier of fortune—in the Peninsula, was induced, in 1822, to set out for South America, with the expectation of obtaining service under O'Higgins or Lord Cochrane. Several of his old associates in Spain had embarked in the same service. He remained in Chili and Peru until 1839; during which long period of his life, and in the history of his adopted country, many of those struggles of faction and those revolutionary movements passed which interested Europe, and in which he was either an actor or an eye-witness.

His work is composed on a hint thrown out in the preface to the last edition of Captain Basil Hall's Journal, written on the coasts of Chili, Peru, and Mexico, which suggested the value of such a work, if written by one who had been an eye-witness of the events described. This Captain Sutcliffe had been, to a very considerable extent, while acting in many campaigns as a cavalry officer in the liberating army. He was afterwards the legitimate successor of Robinson Crusoe, as governor of Juan Fernandez island. The narrative of public and military events is interspersed with sketches of manners; and though the materials may not have been sufficiently sifted for the popular reader, the work contains a great mass of curious topographical facts and interesting details of the productions and natural resources of the country. It will by no means tend to increase the reader's admiration of violent revolutions conducted by military chiefs. Captain Sutcliffe has made out a strong case of individual hardship, to which we fear the British public will be as indifferent as the Chilian authorities. The work is illustrated and ornamented with portraits of the principal South American chiefs, and with views of cities and public buildings.

Dr. Andrew Combe's Principles of Physiology applied to the Preservation of Health, and the Improvement of Physical and Mental Education.

This work has had great success; but not more than it merited, as a sound, temperate, wholesome adviser on many points of the utmost importance to every one having "organs, dimensions, faculties." The new edition before us is the tenth that has appeared within a few years. Such encouragement has had the natural effect of inducing Dr. Combe to render his work more and more worthy of public acceptance. The present edition has undergone considerable improvement and extension. Topics of temporary, or comparatively subordinate interest have been omitted, to make way for others that are considered of more general and permanent interest; and the whole work has been once more carefully revised, and has received the author's finishing touches. A chapter almost entirely new is added on the formation and circulation of the blood, which is illustrated by very neat and accurate cuts. The number of illustrative facts, of cases in point, are considerably increased; and they give the work not merely additional interest with the reader, but add solid value to its contents. No chapter is of more importance than that on ventilation; a subject on which the whole world appears to be awakening. It is not easy for the great majority of mankind, (however well instructed,) as society is at present constituted, to decide on what they shall, or what they shall not eat and drink; or on the leisure or relaxation from toil, mental or bodily, which they shall enjoy; or how they shall be clothed—whether in costly flannel or in cheap calico; but the very poorest have the power of commanding a good share of that common and first of blessings, pure air, to inhale, and also to refresh their dwellings and bedding; and, in most cases, cleanliness of the skin. On these topics Dr. Combe's exhortations may be of use to every one.

As something good and practical, which we do not remember to have seen in any of the former editions, we extract the following paragraph:—"Not only is daily washing of the body required at that, [early] and indeed at every age, but frequent change of clothing is essential; and for this reason it is much to be wished, that a plan of washing the clothes of the poor at a cheap rate, similar to that so successfully in operation in Liverpool, were adopted in all our larger towns. At present, the trouble, time, and expense, imposed upon the mother of a family, among the working classes, in washing and drying the clothes of its individual members, are so great, as to present an almost irresistible temptation to neglect of cleanliness; and when we wonder at the dirt and disorder of a labourer's house, we are too apt to forget the disadvantages under which its inmates are placed; and the cost of time and money, at which cleanliness is obtained, where there are several children to take care of, and cooking and other household operations going on at the same time. Hence, among the poorer classes in large towns, want of cleanliness prevails to a very great extent, and proves highly injurious to health and morality. Actuated by considerations of this description, a few benevolent individuals combined to hire and fit up a cellar in a convenient situation, with the requisite boilers, tubs, and drying stoves, where the poor might have the means of washing their bed and body clothes, at an exceedingly trifling expense of both time and money; and after several years' trial, the results have been most encouraging. Not only the poor have been eager to avail themselves of the privilege held out to them; but numerous instances have occurred in which the wide spread of disease was arrested; and health and character restored, by the habits of cleanliness and self-respect thus fostered. From the very trifling expense at which this establishment is carried on, it is quite evident that a similar plan might be carried into operation in the different districts of every large town."

Here, then, is a practical plan, of which philanthropists and the local authorities of cities may avail themselves, without much of either trouble or pecuniary risk.

One of the most curious cases in the whole history of training occurs in Dr. Combe's book. It is probable that Captain Barclay never had such a pupil as the person described, though he had probably never been subjected to scientific training. Dr. Combe is speaking of the necessity to sound health and mental energy, of daily exercise in the open air, which invigorates the circulation of the blood, and renders respiration free and deep. "Of this," he remarks, "I witnessed a remarkable instance in a strong-built, little Irishman, who, for a mere trifle, ran alongside of one of the Glasgow coaches, for thirty-two miles, in a very wet day, on a muddy road. The average speed was nine miles an hour; and yet the poor fellow did not seem at all distressed, and stopped only because he had arrived at his destination."

Evils and Remedies of the Present System of Popular Election. By James S. Buckingham, Esq.

Every one allows that some evils exist in the present electoral system; but many disagree as to their nature and extent; and nearly all as to the true remedy, the effectual cure for that national evil, which, as Mr. Buckingham truly says, "at every election saps the morals of the whole people, and relaxes, with fearful recklessness, the ties and bonds by which honourable men are bound together at other periods." We are not sure about the honour which is liable to convenient periodical lapses; but the fact of the lapse is incontrovertible. The first and greatest defect of the system, that which Mr. Buckingham, and every radical reformer regrets, is the limited number of electors; and next to this, the limited area of operation; the vicious nature of the property qualification, and of the Registration machinery, and the temptations and facilities to fraudulent practices, and many other evils, which we may be spared enumerating by at once owning the entire system to be even worse than it is described; and getting to the remedies, or the improved system. Mr. Buckingham would of course exclude persons under age, paupers and criminals; but he would also exclude habitual drunkards, a class not easily defined, and all persons unable to read or write, whatever amount of taxes they may pay; and though he recognises the payment of taxes as the great constitutional qualification; this exclusion to be only, however, until the minor is of age, the criminal reformed, the drunkard become temperate, and until the untaught man has acquired the knowledge qualification. And now we have the qualifications exactly defined. They are—Full, legal age; the possession of a good moral character for sobriety and integrity; the capacity to earn an independent subsistence, and the ability to read and write English. But the proofs of qualifications, admitting the justice of those stipulated, would land us in greater difficulty than the present clumsy system of registration. We need not discuss the machinery of a plan, which, with all its defects, would no doubt be an immense improvement on the existing one. The volume contains, besides the details of Mr. Buckingham's Reform

Bill, a string of excellent observations on the qualifications and duties of representatives; and on the duties of constituents. The rest of it is made up of popular lectures on the important topics of Financial and Commercial Reform; and a lecture on Free Trade, and the Corn Laws, which was lately delivered in York. On all these subjects Mr. Buckingham is thoroughly sound.

A Course of Lectures to Young Men, delivered by Ministers of various Denominations in Glasgow.

These lectures, or sermons without a text, are eleven in number. They are, among other things, a satisfactory symptom of the awakened attention which "Ministers of all denominations" begin to pay to the young, and also to the cultivation and enlargement of their own minds. It is no new remark that, in our age, the pulpit, long in the vanward of improvement, now lags far behind the press, the lecture-room, and the bar. The clergy, as a body, begin to feel the necessity of pressing on, and keeping up with the march of the age, if they would maintain their social ascendancy. Of the lectures we have, on a rather hasty perusal, (for the work is just published,) been most struck with Dr. Wardlaw's discourse On the Formation of Character; Dr. Burns of Paisley, On the Reciprocal Duties of Employers and Employed; Mr. John Robson, On the Claims of Science, and the Spirit in which Scientific Investigation should be prosecuted; and, above all, with the fearlessly honest and racy discourse of the Rev. William Anderson, On the Influence of Young Men on the Prospects of Society. Narrow as our limits are, we must give a short extract from this lecture. The speaker is addressing young men who are prospectively to fill the most important offices in society, as ministers, schoolmasters, physicians, lawyers, journalists, &c. To the lawyers and newspaper editors, he says—

There is the Faculty of Law: shall it be composed, in your day, of men of peace, dissuading from strife and ruinous litigation, giving honest counsel, disdaining to secure employment by the deceptive flattery of clients and the cherishing of their pride and revenge, refusing as an insult the proffered brief of the knave, and giving gratuitous aid to the oppressed and injured poor? Is not all this desirable? Is it not all necessary to make our city honourable and happy? And tell me if the training for such a high-minded discharge of duty be not widely different from that to which many of our youth are subjected, and in which they willingly acquiesce. What villainy is there so base that it will not find an attorney for its defence, provided the fee be secured. Woe unto men! that God's ordinance of Law, established for the dispensing of justice, should be perverted into the instrument of the heaviest oppression under which the earth groans; and that that man should stand highest in the profession who, by quibbling and sophistication, is most dexterous in saving the wicked from merited punishment; or who, by taking advantage of forms and barbarous statutes, perplexes and delays the vindication of the rights of the innocent and injured, so as to drive him to unfavourable compromises, or make him resign his cause in disgust—all being so well managed for the interests of the knave. He is your client, you say, and you must do your best for him. Vile slave! Slave of the villain's bribe, who with his gold has mastered himself of thy dastardly soul, that thou mayest tell lies for him with all thy might, and assist him in his robbery of the widow and orphan. Not so fast with your triumphing! That widow's and orphan's tears have appealed the case to a higher tribunal, at which yourself, as well as your client, shall be judged; and when the only question asked shall be—Was your own conscience satisfied of the righteousness of the cause? Next to the ministry of the Gospel is the profession of Law. Next to it for nobleness, when occupied with integrity. . . .

Newspaper Editors.—Who dares hint at anything which needs reform among them, to be carried into execution when you wield the power of the press! I dare. Lies, known to be lies, written and published in the spirit of the assassin, sometimes in political, not seldom in private malice, the law of libel and personal chastisement being the only restraints which the conscience of the coward acknowledges—the idlest rumour of the street or gossip of the tea-table, or drunken harangue of the tavern, given as authentic intelligence, if it tend to discredit the opposite party; and truth, what is known to be truth, suppressed and refused insertion, when it would vindicate them of the charge—exposure of private character and of domestic circumstance, and an exhibition of men's frailties to ridicule when no public advantage is gained—all done in the mercenary spirit of gratifying the depraved taste of censorious and envious subscribers. By one, the flattery of tyrants, cherishing them in their contempt and oppression of the people—by another the flattery, baser if possible, of the mob, teaching them despite of all authority, and ill-will towards every man who through industry and economy is better attired than themselves—profane jokes, and sometimes licentious, violating the sacredness of divine truth, and polluting the moral sentiments—columns prostrated for pay to the dissemination of the impositions of the quack and the fraudulent, in utter disregard of the robbery and ruin of the ignorant and credulous—reigning over all, a want of recognition of the Divine government, or that recognition made in such a spirit for the serving of selfish and factious ends, that the glory of God is rather hindered than advanced. How few are the exceptions (are there any) in which one or more of these charges may not be justly made against the manner in which this power, so great for evil or good, is conducted at the present day? Is yours, my young brethren, to be a day of reform! and are the candour and patriotism, as well as intelligence, which are requisite, in the course of preparation! Is that day shall there be a happy emulation betwixt the pulpit and the press, which shall send forth the purer and more salutary stream for the irrigating of our city, till the press be given a share of the honours of its legend—"Let Glasgow flourish by the preaching of the word and its newspaper circulation."

This is not the ordinary style of even week-day preaching, but it is something quite as efficient.

Claston and Morton's Companion to Attwood's Machine for Explaining the Laws of Falling Bodies; with an Apparatus for Illustrating the Theory of the Pendulum.

The authors of this small manual are instrument or rather apparatus makers, and they have projected a series of compendious treatises for the purpose of assisting experimenters in the use of the apparatus which they construct; or, in other words, in conducting experiments in mechanics. The first Companion of the series refers, as the above title shows, to Attwood's Machine, and to the additional apparatus for illustrating the theory of the pendulum constructed by the ingenious authors. They state in their preface that their frequent communications with eminent professors and scientific men have furnished them with many valuable hints in the performance of experiments, which they are desirous to diffuse. The language of the Companion is clear and precise. We recommend the little book, and the apparatus which it illustrates, to the attention of students and teachers of the Science of Mechanics, and to the Mechanics' Institutions.

Natural Philosophy for Beginners.

An intelligent and well-arranged System, intended for a Text-Book; and apparently well adapted for that object. The illustrative diagrams and figures are neat and distinct.

The Visitor's Guide to the Watering-Places.

This little guide, which contains a great quantity of useful information for its size, relates chiefly to those watering-places which are easily reached from London by steamer, or coach. It contains a fair account of Cheltenham, Tunbridge, Southampton, the Isle of Wight, Hastings, Margate, Ramsgate, Brighton, and so forth; and will be found useful to persons visiting those places.

The Goodness of Divine Providence Explained and Illustrated. By Robert Maxwell Macbrair.

This is a vindication of the ways of God to man, if such a phrase be allowable, which contains much that is very good, stated in a practical and familiar way; and containing nothing that is either startling or recondite.

A Legend of the Lovers'-Seat. By Alfred Coleman.

This is a poem written by a very young man, for the laudable purpose of assisting the funds of the East Sussex Infirmary, lately established at Hastings. It possesses considerable poetic merit, and will, we trust, fulfil the author's benevolent design.

Lays and Legends of Kent. Edited by the Author of "The Sea-Wolf."

We cannot say more of "The Lays and Legends," than that "She is a Kentish Maiden," is certainly very pretty; and the "Provençal Romance of Guillemette La Delanaise" very piquant.

SHAKESPEARIANA; A CATALOGUE OF SHAKESPEARE'S PLAYS, and of their COMMENTATORS, &c. &c. By James Orchard Halliwell, Esq.

NEW NOVELS.

James Hatfield and the Beauty of Buttermere. With Illustrations. By Robert Cruikshank. 3 vols. Colburn.

A romance well enough adapted to serve its day and generation this. But we are so thoroughly imbued with the tame, commonplace latter story of the real Beauty of Buttermere, that we feel as unfit to judge of her melodramatic appearance, as of a metrical romance on the Maid of Athens in her new character of Mrs. Black.

Isidora or the Neapolitan. By an old Author in a New Walk. 3 vols. Saunders & Otley.

A pleasing romance, abounding in fine scenic description, and of which the movement is throughout airy and easy, and not without tragic as well as romantic interest. It is slightly connected with history, or rather with historical names; but the characters are the mere generalities of fiction, with the exception of one personage, something between the knavish, lying valet of low comedy, and the rapacious, low ruffian of romance. But in his blended elements, Bernardo is truer to nature, and a higher dramatic creation, than either of those somewhat hackneyed personages.—The author has selected the groups and scenes for his successive pictures with considerable artistic skill. He opens with a splendid Bull Fight in Toledo, during the early part of the reign of the Emperor Charles V. The scene changes to Naples, where the sights peculiar to that city pass before us with much dramatic effect; and we have an animated and affecting dramatic representation of the Plague. On the story, which is simple, we do not touch.

PAMPHLETS.

SERJEANT TALFOUND'S SPEECH IN DEFENCE OF Mr. Moxon, in the prosecution for publishing SHELLEY'S WORK, delivered June 23, 1841.—This is a speech which will be referred to, as one of authority, while trials of this nature continue to outrage popular opinion. But it is more the eloquent advocacy of a poet and a friend, than the oration of a lawyer. Indeed mere law has comparatively little to do with this question.

A GUIDE to nearly ONE HUNDRED LOAN-SOCIETIES.—This pamphlet will open up to many persons a new phase of London life.

A MEMOIR on the COTTON of EGYPT. By George R. Gildon, late United States Consul at Cairo.

CRIMINAL JURISPRUDENCE IN RELATION to MENTAL ORGANIZATION. By B. Sampson.

DISCRETIONARY POWER EXEMPLIFIED, in a LETTER to EDWARD TWISLETON, Esq., Assistant Poor-law Commissioner.—This letter is written by Mr. George Sandby, a clergyman, and an admirer of the new Poor-law.

FACTS connected with the TREATMENT of INSANITY in St. LUKE'S HOSPITAL, with LETTERS on the Subject to Lord BROUGHAM, Dr. BIRKBECK, ELLIOTSON, and others. By a Lady.—These letters are written by a Miss Newell, who was, at different periods, a patient in St. Luke's Hospital. Her case is curious in a medical and moral view; and, if her complaints be well-founded, unreasonable as some of her individual grievances manifestly are, there is good ground for inquiry, though St. Luke's and all such establishments are greatly ameliorated since she was first confined there more than twenty years ago.

WHY the EASTERN QUESTION CANNOT BE SATISFACTORILY SETTLED. By L. Q. Sawaszkiewicz.—When it is explained that this pamphlet is written by a Pole, it is unnecessary to point out the one great obstacle which he perceives to the settlement of the Eastern Question. But no man of any nation can doubt that Russia is indeed a very formidable obstacle.

THE MARRIAGE LAW CONSIDERED, in a LETTER addressed to the BISHOP of LONDON. By a Barrister-at-Law.—There are at present some party or parties extremely active to establish the legality of marriages contracted with a deceased wife's sister; a liberty which has been recognised by law in some of the United States of America, where the right is allowed to men, while women are not at liberty to contract marriage with a deceased husband's brother. Until the point is argued upon the broad basis of equality of legal rights of the sexes, it is scarce worth considering; and we have as yet heard of no advocate for the marriages of sisters-in-law with brothers-in-law. The LETTER is able, and learned; and in the justice of the animadversions on the evasions, or the shameful partiality of certain late proceedings in the House of Peers in relation to a marriage of this kind, contracted by one of that body, when a statute was passed for the purpose of legalizing a particular marriage, by declaring all subsequent marriages of the same sort illegal, every one must concur.

The case is thus pointed out:—

But was it that my Lord Lyndhurst was seized with horror at the impety of such alliances as those mentioned above, and which determined him to give no slumber to his eyelids until an effectual stop was put to them? And would that learned lord have shuddered at the idea of marrying a young rich beautiful heiress because she happened to have been the sister of his deceased lady! We ought not to prejudge any man's motives, but in a few words give the history of that statute.

A certain noble duke, having vast possessions, happening to marry his sister-in-law, and not liking to trust the interests of his family to the chances of a suit in the Ecclesiastical Court for an incestuous marriage, which under the circumstances of an after-family would have proved exceedingly disagreeable, obtained the friendly offices of the above noble law-lord to present a bill, the provisions of which went to declare all past marriages within the prohibited degrees valid, embracing of course in this part of the statute, that one for which it was made, the marriage of the noble duke; but then to pacify the claims of the church for this terrible outrage upon its jurisdiction, and to soothe the alarm of the prelates, and induce them to afford their sanction and assistance, a clause was introduced, declaring that all future marriages of the same kind should be absolutely void!! Thus this legal pilot, having got his friend safe on shore, suffered the vessel, with all other persons who might venture therein, to sink. But, oh, my lord, it is too serious a matter! If, as your lordship afterwards contends, such marriages are a sin, why trifle with that sin, and pass a law which in one breath declares all past offences in a certain matter to be lawful, but that all future ones of the same kind shall be accounted sins? If, my lord, a certain act be one of moral turpitude in the sight of God, what right has your lordship, either by a statute of parliament or any other means, to declare that it is not so? It is true, that at the outset (I love to be candid) both Lords Brougham and Lyndhurst attempted to fix a kind of statutory limitation, or a period from the solemnization of the forbidden marriage, beyond which it should not be impeached; but this provision savouring rather too much of common—viz. vulgar—sense, was not allowed to form part of the ingredient.

AN HISTORICAL EXAMINATION OF THE CORN LAWS. HODGES & SMITH, Dublin.—After examining the effects of corn laws in ancient Rome, and in England from the time of the Third Edward down to that of the Sliding Scale, the writer comes to the following conclusions:—

The corn laws have failed to produce steadiness in the market; they have produced the contrary, and have increased the quantity of agricultural distress.

They have taken a vast amount of gold and wealth from us.

They cover our land with poor and poor-houses.

There is a constant ascending progression in the import duties, and consequently in the prices of the necessities of life.

They keep up a war establishment of prices in time of peace.

Like our national debt, they are the offspring of war, and continually increasing.

They are an impediment to our trade in all its branches, and to our national wealth.

They increase the burdens of the poor and the riches of the wealthy, by imposing a tax of £10,000,000 annually on the necessities of life. This vast sum going into the pockets of the landowners and not contributing a penny to the public revenue.*

The principal maxim inculcated by Lorenzo the Great, in the education of his son Leo, was, that to ensure the tranquillity of his government, he should take care that there were no monopolies in corn, which, with all the other necessities of life should have free access to open market.

It is incident to the imperfection of the human understanding to be unable to survey and comprehend a complex abuse, venerable by its antiquity and

"Grey with the mist of years."

When the light of reform first dawns upon and opens it to view, like the light of day it must ascend and spread itself over and dispel the darkness that covers it, before all its deformities are exposed. When this takes place, it is unwise and dangerous not to pursue the course which reason and justice point out, and to suffer our bad passions to obstruct them. The abuse of the corn-law system is defended by its ancient birth and high pretensions; so may the abuses of religion, of our common and statute law: they are yielding before the increasing knowledge of the present times. Reform presses onwards, its momentum acquires daily strength and velocity. Let us assist those who have shown themselves able and willing to direct it in the ways of peace and plenty.

As to the manner in which the corn-laws specially affect the country of the author of the pamphlet, Ireland, he remarks—

Ireland must derive much greater benefits from a repeal of the corn laws than England; her energies which, by means of the late war, and the temporary value which land and its produce then received, had been drawn from her manufactures; and the vast internal resources which she possesses for their growth and extension have been since exclusively directed to agricultural pursuits, and to the improvement of the properties of the great land-owners, the absentees, who are thus encouraged to remain in London, and support every bill introduced for raising the price of the necessities of life and their own rents. Absenteeism, the source of many evils to Ireland has been more supported and increased by the corn laws than by anything else. They protect and watch over the lands in the absence of their owners who leave them behind in perfect security. They have produced rick-burns, Rockism, whiteboyism, and the predial agitation which has been so hideously disfiguring the country with crime. A great portion of the evils of Ireland may be traced to this source. We have the testimony of the leading men of both parties, that exclusive agriculture and the neglect of manufactures has been the cause of her present poverty, her paupers, her poor law, and heavy poor rates. Mr. O'Connell and the Rev. Dr. Boyton have repeatedly said so, and upon the most conclusive evidence, by comparing the present condition of Ireland with what it was during its manufacturing existence. In Ireland, a repeal of the corn laws would render provisions of all kinds cheap; it would reduce the number of our poor and our poor rates; it would increase employment for them; it would diminish the quantity of absenteeism by compelling landlords to come home and look after their lands; it would increase the comfort of the lower classes and reduce the luxuries of the rich; predial agitation would subside, the crimes and immoralities that spring from poverty would disappear, and the social condition would improve.

PERIODICAL AND SERIAL WORKS.

TYTLER'S HISTORY OF SCOTLAND, Volume III.; containing the Reigns of Robert II. and III.; the Regency of Albany, and the Reign of James I. It is to this volume that Mr. Tytler has appended his "HISTORICAL REMARKS UPON THE DEATH OF RICHARD THE SECOND," a mysterious subject, which has long exercised the powers of those fond of historical research, and of the critical and minute investigation of controverted points. Those who may refuse to adopt Mr. Tytler's hypothesis must at least admire the acuteness and ingenuity by which it is sustained.

KNIGHT'S PICTORIAL SHAKSPEARE, Part XXXV.

TYAS'S ILLUSTRATED SHAKSPEARE, Parts XXVI. and XXVII.

FOX'S BOOK OF MARTYRS, Parts VI., VII. The 6th Part contains a fine portrait of Bishop Ridley, besides the usual landscape, and other embellishments.

BRAND'S DICTIONARY OF SCIENCE, LITERATURE, and ART, Parts VI. and VII.

FLORICULTURAL MAGAZINE, Nos. 61, and 63.

* Report of Import Duties' Committee, 1840.

DICTIONARY OF PRINTING, Nos. 15, and 16.

TYAS'S HISTORY OF NAPOLEON, Parts XXIX., XXX., and XXXI.—Part XXXI. concludes the work. It contains two portraits (wood engravings) of Napoleon, at different periods of his life—both admirable likenesses; and a number of his remarkable autographs. The work, though from its nature sketchy, is one of interest, independently of the prodigality of its embellishments.

MALTE BRUN'S and BALBI'S SYSTEMS OF GEOGRAPHY ABRIDGED. Part III.—The Part is chiefly occupied with the conclusion of the geography of Europe; the omissions are judicious; the new matter useful and compendious. This is a work too well established to require commendation.

CHAMBERS'S INFORMATION for the PEOPLE, Part VI., is a capital sevenpence worth, of geographical information, about the several countries of the vast continent of America.

CYCLOPEDIA OF COMMERCE, MERCANTILE LAW, FINANCE, &c., by William Waterston, accountant. Part I.—This is a New Dictionary, published by Oliver & Boyd. Its distinguishing feature, (and to commercial people it must be one of great importance,) is peculiar fulness on Mercantile Law. The work is very well printed; and will be acceptable to many as a Guide and Counsellor.

THE JOURNAL OF CIVILISATION, Part I.—This is a new periodical work, commenced in London, the purposes of which seem nearly the same as those of "Chambers's Information for the People;" or, as it sets forth, it is established to promote "civilisation at home and abroad, and for the record of geographical discovery, colonization, and missionary enterprise." It has little maps; and some really fine and characteristic wood-engravings, illustrative of national character and manners.

LE KEUX'S MEMORIALS OF CAMBRIDGE, Parts XVI. and XVII.

THE SCENERY and ANTIQUITIES OF IRELAND. Illustrated by Bartlett; the literary department by N. P. Willis. Parts V., VI., VII. Mr. Willis has got out of Ulster and Leinster, and fairly into Connaught. He begins judiciously, as we think, to draw upon former tourists, such as Inglis, and Mr. Cesar Otway,

POLITICAL REGISTER.

SIR ROBERT PEEL.—We will not all at once give up our hope of Sir Robert Peel taking heart of grace, and yet out-bidding, in wise and liberal measures, his great rival, Lord John Russell. The Times is putting out feelers on the corn-law question—the Trade-wind is chopping round. Poor Sir Robert is certainly, in the meanwhile, gagged; but when the time comes, it may be found that he is not so completely fettered as the Whig organs represent him. There was an Emancipation Question—and an 1829. The people at large, we can assure Sir Robert, were never more indifferent to merely party considerations than at the present moment; nor more disposed to receive good measures with cordial thankfulness, come from what quarter they may. Sir Robert Peel has the option of being not only the saviour of every one of the great and permanent interests of his country, but of being a highly popular minister, if he shall be found anything more than what the Whigs represent him—the timid, tricky tool of the Tories.

We remember 1829, and will not surrender all hope of Sir Robert. If his courage—if the nobility of his nature—be found equal to his enlightenment and practical good sense, we shall have greater hope of him than of any Whig aristocrat of the batch. Nothing can finally condemn him save his own acts; and he is on the eve of a great and final, but fair, trial.

In a newly started, and very able Weekly London journal, bearing the stanch and well-omened title of The Nonconformist, which we warmly recommend to the attention of all earnest and single-minded reformers, we find the real difficulties of the proximate premier thus forcibly stated:—

"It is rumoured that Sir Robert, fearful of trying the experiment of increased taxation, will cut down expenditure, and make it square with the present income of the country. What then? This will not remove his difficulties. A steadily declining revenue is not the complaint with which he has to deal, but only a symptom of it. Taxation is as nothing in comparison of monopoly. Give us leave, (mark that! the nation is under necessity in this matter of asking leave,) give us leave to trade, when, where, and in what articles we please, and our national debt would not only be borne manfully, but easily and with cheerfulness. Our interests can stand up under this burden, but they cannot suffer a privation of natural sustenance, too. We are not crushed by external pressure, but with internal weakness. Trade and commerce are gasping for proper aliment; lightening their load will not meet their case. Not the back, but the stomach craves attention."

Will Sir Robert Peel be wise? Will he consider these things? Will he be the benefactor of the millions of Great Britain—of the whole human race—a truly GREAT MAN—or the tortured and despised Tory fag of a day? The choice is in his power; or if it be not, he has no right to assume office.

TORY FALLACIES.—The Tory newspapers have lately been circulating a statement which many of them must know to be grossly incorrect. The price of bread in America is represented as being greatly higher than the present high price of Britain. This trick was based on the assumed ignorance of the English people of the denominations of the money of the United States. But out of evil cometh good. In the Derbyshire Chronicle, the following Family Bill of a respectable individual of the working classes, in the town of Cincinnati, brought over by a Wesleyan missionary, now in the Staffordshire Potteries, has been published, showing the real state of prices in the respective countries:—

In America.	s.	d.
3 stones of flour, at 1s. 1½d., . . .	3	4½
2 oz. tea, 1½d.; ¼ lb. coffee, 2½d., . . .	0	4
1½ lbs. sugar, at 5d., . . .	0	7½
4 lbs. beef, at 4d., . . .	1	4
3 lbs. mutton, at 2d., . . .	0	6
2 lbs. bacon, at 2d., . . .	0	4
2 lbs. butter, at 8d., . . .	0	6
	7	0

This same missionary also stated that wages are higher and employment more constant than in England. The same eatables in highly-favoured England, where everything is blessed (!) with a tax to protect the landed interest and keep up rents, would be as follows:—

In England.	s.	d.
3 stones flour, at 2s. 8d., . . .	8	0
2 oz. tea, 8d.; ¼ lb. coffee, 6d., . . .	1	2
1½ lb. sugar, at 8d., . . .	1	0
4 lbs. beef, at 7d., . . .	2	4
3 lbs. mutton, at 6½d., . . .	1	7½
2 lbs. bacon, at 8d., . . .	1	4
2 lbs. butter, at 1s. 1d., . . .	2	2

In connexion with this subject, and as a practical illustration of the article on Wages and Prices in this Number of the Magazine, we quote the following from the Wills Independent; and many papers in England might repeat the same tale:—

"FOOD AND WAGES.—A month ago, the general rate of wages in this neighbourhood, for the best able-bodied labourers was 9s. a-week, and the price of the 8 lb. loaf was 13d. Now the 8 lb. loaf is charged 17d.; but no increase has taken place in wages, nay, on the contrary, in some instances, the 9s. have been reduced to 8s."

MANCHESTER ASSEMBLY OF DIVINES.—No one will accuse us of being inordinate admirers of Extraordinary Convocations of "spiritual persons," though we may, perhaps, be open to blame for something exactly the reverse,—for an inordinate jealousy of the interference of the clergy (as a body) in matters which do not belong to their peculiar province. Yet no event has given us more sincere satisfaction than the solemn national meeting of clerical delegates now holding in Manchester. However voluntarily the several members may have gone to this assembly, we consider them as the accredited delegates of their respective localities and congregations, and as individuals eminently qualified for the office. If extreme poverty and misery be indeed the fertile cause of ignorance and vice, the question of the Corn and Provision Laws is emphatically a moral and religious question; and ministers fall far short of their true functions when they waive these vital topics and entrench themselves behind the panoply of theology. Who know, or ought so intimately to know, the actual in-door condition of the poor as their pastors? Who may so effectively bring their sufferings before the world? They cannot be suspected of sinister or selfish objects. They are neither Traders nor Master Manufacturers. From the information collected and the reports that will be published by this Assembly, we anticipate the most important results to the great cause which every friend of humanity, of good morals, of true religion, of the prosperity of Great Britain, has warmly at heart.

AGRICULTURE.

From everything we can collect of the prospect of the harvest in all parts of the three kingdoms, we have little hesitation in saying, that the crops are likely to be late, and deficient both in quantity and quality. For many weeks past we have had few days without rain, and occasionally the rain has not only continued for a great number of hours with little interruption, but has been excessively heavy. At the time at which we write, (19th August,) the great bulk of the grain is quite green throughout Scotland, and it will be ten or fourteen days before there is anything like a general harvest, even in the Lothians. Owing to the thinness of the wheat it has suffered less from being laid down than could be expected, but few fields are to be found which have not suffered from the fly or rust. In East Lothian the crop will be much under an average, for although the late-sown wheat is a tolerable crop, the early sown is very deficient. Oats have been, in general, much lodged by the rain, and, unless there is a continuance of dry weather, must suffer severely. Potatoes promise to be abundant, although there are blanks of considerable extent in some fields. Barley will probably turn out an average crop; and turnips, except on damp soils, promise well. The prices of all sorts of grain continue to rise weekly, and the aggregate averages of the six weeks, which regulate duty, have risen for some time, about one shilling a quarter per week. It is now nearly certain, that in the month of September, the duty on wheat will fall to 6s. 8d. a quarter; and many anticipate, that before the middle of October the duty will be as low as 1s. The quantity of wheat in bond does not exceed 500,000 quarters, being about one half of what is usual at this season; and the supply abroad is much exhausted, while the prospect of the harvest in Germany and France is by no means flattering. The consequence has been a great rise of price. At Dantzic, Stettin, and the other ports whence we derive our principal supplies, good wheat cannot be purchased under 60s.; while in London the price of the best quality has reached 82s. Considerable quantities of foreign grain are daily arriving, much larger have been ordered, and if the crop in this country turn out anything like an average, the farmers will get a lesson which they will not soon forget, in regard to the operation of the Sliding-scale on their particular interest. For, at the very time that they will be preparing to bring their crops into market, they will be exposed to a severe competition with the holders of foreign grain, and so great a quantity may probably be thrown upon the market, that the price which would be realized, under a free-trade system, will be depressed for many months to come. The miserable results of the Sliding-scale are strongly illustrated by the great increase of the price of grain which has taken place in all the continental ports within these few months. This increase is at least 10s. a quarter on wheat, and as the best judges estimate that the foreign importation will reach two millions of quarters, the present corn-laws will occasion a loss to Britain of at least one million in the course of three months; for, on referring to statistical tables, it will be found that the average price of wheat at Dantzic, since the end of the war—1817 to 1839 both included—was only 34s. 4d., and it is certainly a liberal allowance to assume that the average price of wheat is 15s. 8d. below the highest quality. Now, it might be some compensation for the loss of a million to the community generally, could it be shown that our farmers, or even landlords, pocketed it. But it is perfectly plain that it goes entirely to foreigners, without increasing either the profit of the farmer or the rental of the landlord. There is, however, a matter of still more serious concern in the present state of our monetary system. Coming, as we do, only by fits and starts into the continental corn market, nearly the whole of our grain must be purchased with bullion, because as we will not take the only thing the corn-growing countries have to send us—the products of their soil—they cannot carry on with us any steady or exclusive trade for our manufactures. Now, all the bullion in the Bank of England at present—little more than five millions—will scarcely purchase the quantity of foreign grain which we require; hence the Bank is compelled to withdraw the accommodation previously afforded to all classes, and particularly to merchants and manufacturers, who again are forced to contract their operations, and dismiss the hands employed by them, whereby the demand for food is diminished, so that the agriculturists themselves are amongst the first losers by the existence of a system which is sedulously held out by the land-aristocracy as a "protection" to them, i. e. as the means of increasing their profits, and enabling the landowners to extort from them exorbitant rents—the real object for which restrictions on the importation of food were originally imposed and have been since kept up.

Notwithstanding the threatened, and we hope impending, alteration of the corn-laws, and the miserable state of the manufacturing districts, we see few symptoms of agricultural distress or even apprehension. At a late sale of a property within five miles of Liverpool, 43 acres brought £20,000, and 112 acres, yielding £112 of rent, from £400 to £500 an acre. A property of 80 acres in the county of Edinburgh, (Ford,) having no local advantages whatever, and certainly not worth 50s. an acre, has recently been sold for £10,520, more than forty per cent. purchase of the rental. There are neither buildings, wood, nor minerals on the property of any value, and there is not the smallest chance of it being leased or applied to manufacturing purposes. Twenty-three acres of the Kelvin Grove estate, in the neighbourhood of Glasgow, have also been lately sold for £30,000, or upwards of £1300 per Scotch acre.

WHAT WILL SIR ROBERT PEEL DO?—

—THIS question is likely now to remain for a Christmas puzzle, or to furnish a hint for some sudden and wonderful incident, or unexpected transformation, by one stroke of Harlequin's wand, to the mechanist and wit who contrives the Pantomime. Sir Robert Peel's pertinacious silence has in the meanwhile given wide scope to all manner of conjectures, a few of the more probable of which we may particularize. The truth is, poor Sir Robert is himself as much at a loss about what he is to do, or more correctly, about what he may be able to accomplish, as any one of the guessers. He has surrounded himself with a Cabinet, some of whom are as difficult to drive in the right direction as Tipperary pigs. Even with the Duke of Wellington for an auxiliary or whipper-in, several of them are likely to prove utterly unmanageable; and Sir Robert's best hope, at present, seems the old Whig trust—the chapter of accidents; the unknown something that may arise during the respite which he craves.

Since we last had occasion to speak of Sir Robert Peel, and with something like hope, he has deliberately formed his government, and with a large proportion of the worst possible ingredients. His sovereign intrusted him with full and ample powers to select his colleagues; he boasts of his purity of motive, of his personal independence, and he puts together his discordant Cabinet. It follows that Sir Robert either wanted the power to exclude such individuals as the Duke of Buckingham, Earl Ripon, Sir Edward Knatchbull, Sir James Graham, Mr. William Gladstone, and others,—or the inclination; and either way, it augurs ill indeed for his being the government which is to meet the wishes and necessities of the country. Sir Robert, among those good sayings which sometimes drop from him, has remarked, that no Minister can longer hold office in this country but in accordance with public opinion: not the opinion of a limited constituency, but public opinion. But is the composition of his Cabinet in accordance with public opinion, or even with the opinions of his best supporters—the rational middle-class Tories? Their hope can only be, that he will jockey or out-manceuvre those whom he has adopted as colleagues mainly to prevent their being open enemies.

All is conjecture and hope. The time is not come for speech; and people are at freedom to adopt the hypothesis which most flatters their wishes. One man says that Sir Robert must, even in the face of a falling revenue, have made up his mind to repeal the malt-tax, else the Duke of Buckingham never would have joined his government; the Duke being pledged to the repeal of that impost, and having, on this very point formerly refused to join a Peel Cabinet. "If this be the case," says another, "then Sir Robert must contemplate a swingeing property-tax, to make good the malt-tax and the existing deficiencies." "No—Retrenchment is to be the order of the day," says a third; "a reduction of the army expenditure—Peel's speeches point to that—perhaps the revision of the pension-list, and the abolition of all sinecures and unmerited pensions. Perhaps the Duke of Wellington may magnanimously set the example in the present terribly distressed state of the country, of suggesting a reduction of some of those enormous pensions which have been merited." A fourth, conjectures that Sir Robert means to make Parliament purchase the secret of Martin Cavanagh, the fasting Irishman, and communicate it to the master-manufacturers, for the benefit of those in their employment who, not having acquired the art, first—and very naturally too—brought to perfection by a native of Ireland, are starving and dying in all the manufacturing towns. But this might be a dangerous expedient; for if the people once get the trick of living without food, there must be another entire revolution in the Corn Laws. They must be changed to something resembling the French gabelle, a tax by which the poor were compelled to purchase a certain quantity of salt from the Farmers-general, whether they needed it or not,—and which, the dearness of bread, was one main cause of the French Revolution. Those who laugh at the purchase of Cavanagh's secret, pay some attention to another conjecture. They think it not improbable that Sir James Graham's panacea of 1830 may now be adopted, and financial embarrassment be relieved by at once cutting off 30 per cent. from the interest of the public debt. This does not seem so improbable. The new Home Secretary, like the Duke of Buckingham, would formerly have nothing to say to Peel; and the fair inference is, that Sir Robert may have gained him over by acceding to a plan which has many admirers among the landlords, were it only practicable, and were they guaranteed against sharing in the common ruin, which touching the fundholders might precipitate.

Probable as each of the ingenious conjectures to which the mystical silence of Sir Robert Peel gives rise, may be, our original supposition appears more probable,—which is, that Sir Robert must contemplate the possibility of cheating his pigs by the legerdemain of the sliding-scale, and driving them gently his own way, while they fancy they are taking the opposite course. When Sir Robert asserts that in his Cabinet there is to be no more of the humbug of Open Questions—that “nothing is to be proposed here that it may be defeated there;” and that, having once made up his mind, he purposes to carry out his policy with energy which is to astonish the world—we are exceedingly glad to hear it; though this again complicates the difficulty and perplexes us about who, when that time arrives, are to be the ins and who the outs of that Cabinet; whether Sir Robert himself and Lord Ellenborough are to retire, or the Duke of Buckingham and Sir Edward Knatchbull. How is the course which he promises possible, with the mixture of heterogenous ingredients which he has gathered round him? How is united and energetic action possible in the Peel government, as it is at present constituted; and which party is next Lent to swallow up the other?

Sir Robert Peel can give no satisfactory reason to the country for the mystery which he maintains, save the true one, namely, that what he considers sound policy forbids plain speaking. It would be too humiliating to the pride of recent premierships to avow that he is not his own master—that he must have time, by finesse and by the strength of public opinion, to get rid of the more bigoted landowners, and to force lesser men to succumb. The insolent threat of the Duke of Richmond may not be forgotten by the plebeian Premier, but the time has not come to resent it. The incubus, personated by the Duke of Buckingham and Sir Edward Knatchbull, is not easily shaken off, and the Premier is a very patient and prudent statesman.

Always willing to hope for the best, and believing, with Lord Palmerston, that Sir Robert Peel has some sound convictions on the subject which at present agitates the public mind, we were desirous to see him obtain a fair trial. But by the construction of his government he has made that next to impossible. His own colleagues preclude it; and many that would have been willing to give a fair and patient trial to Peel can have neither faith nor hope in the most inveterate of the monopolists. If he had possessed any personal weight, any moral influence, the time was surely come when he was warranted to make trial of it. It was surely equally easy, and would have been far more manly, to exclude, than to include with the hope of afterwards ousting—for no one hopes to convert his more obnoxious associates: persons hateful to the country, and opposed even to those small changes to which Sir Robert himself is tacitly pledged. But he has not shown even the passive courage of lying by for a little when it was needful. Was he, indeed, afraid that the Corn Monopolists—the Anti-Free-Trade men—could carry on the Government without him? The fear had been more reasonable, that he could not long carry it on with them. He knows this; and hence the true reason of his silence. This much is fairly deducible from his reply to Lord John Russell, when pressed to unfold his policy. His mouth, he owns, is hermetically sealed in consequence of something “in the peculiar circumstances connected with the formation of the Government.” Is he then gagged by the very Government he has just formed? Are these peculiar circumstances those which forbid him to follow out his own policy? The Earl of Ripon is a “circumstance,” and Sir Edward Knatchbull a “circumstance,” and the Duke of Buckingham a huge “circumstance.” He scorns the imputation of being the subservient tool of the Tory landlords; but, if an uncontrolled minister, contemplating important changes of a permanent sort, and particularly in the existing Corn Law, why has he at the outset trammelled himself? His selection of colleagues has damped expectation that perhaps was unwarranted. What favourable augury is to be drawn of a Government comprehending the Duke of Buckingham, Knatchbull, the Earl of Ripon, Lord Stanley, and Sir James Graham, and with so little to counterbalance them; although the Duke of Wellington, in his anomalous character of umpire, should incline to the Peel side? The consequence is already seen in wider discontent and more active agitation.

The line of argument by which Sir Robert, in the first regular parliamentary skirmish of the Whig Opposition, defended his silent policy, savours too much of the trickery of which he is generally accused. Retaliation, a fair hit at the Whigs, is but sorry argument to the nation, whom he surely cannot identify with the Whigs. This sort of shuffling is unworthy and paltry; and after descending to it, Sir Robert lets out the true cause of his silence, namely, those “peculiar circumstances in the formation of the Government,” which meanwhile gag him. He must have time for examination before he can speak. He cannot be a stranger to the deficiency in the revenue; but then he is ignorant of the provisions of the commercial treaty to be established with Texas! The decay or ruin of manufactures—the general and severe distress—are pretty notorious; but Sir Robert must first know about what amount of aid the Colonies may require next year, before a remedy can be provided.

What, it was pertinently remarked by Lord Palmerston, is he to learn "from ransacking the archives of the Board of Trade or the Foreign Office?" What has the Premier-expectant been about for the last ten years, that he is so miserably ignorant? Has he not been a member of Parliament and the leader of the Opposition in the Commons all that time, when not actually minister? What would be thought of a General of division liable at any moment to be called into action, who pleaded in bar of doing his duty that he had been paying no attention to the battle? This is unworthy of Sir Robert Peel. He is an unskilful card-player who finesses over much; Sir Robert cannot resist the temptation of finessing,—and he errs in excess.

This display of party tactics, whichever side may have excelled, would be of small value, and good fun enough, if a suffering and discontented People were not farther exasperated by evasion,—a People who claim the right of open dealing from the man who, at so momentous a crisis, has been bold enough to undertake the Government. There is, as he was again well told by Lord Palmerston, "a country as well as a House of Commons" waiting to learn its fate.—What pity, by the way, that his Lordship and his friends had not remembered this fact sooner!—No man knows better than Sir Robert Peel, that public opinion, on many vital points, and, above all, on the Corn Laws, is partially or unfairly represented in Parliament. And he sometimes professes the respect for public opinion, which must, more and more, mark every enlightened English statesman. The result of the late election cannot wholly mislead Sir Robert into the belief that the people at large, or that even the limited constituency, are enamoured of dear bread and sugar, and heavy taxation. The elections, where they were not influenced by bribery and intimidation, were a momentary pettish expression of indignation at the conduct of the Whigs, carried, by some reformers, to the foolish length of punishing themselves, to get amends of faltering friends. This is already repented, as in Sunderland, and as it will soon be in all other places where the landlords do not sway.

Sir Robert Peel knows all this; and perhaps it is as well that he craves time to make up his mind. No mind that he durst speak out now could be listened to with satisfaction. Stronger proofs of distress, another winter of agitation, may be required to pave the way for Sir Robert's dexterous compromise between the Free-Traders and the Monopolists. At best it can, we fear, be no more than a temporary compromise; yet we may be mistaken. There are, spite of the awful bugbears in the Cabinet, some favourable symptoms in the country. The middle-class Tories, the reasonable part of them, the Peelites—and they are numerous—are quietly making up their minds to follow their leader, even on the Corn-Law question, to the extent of gradual but entire repeal, if the interests of the country are proved to require the sacrifice. They are come the length of saying, that the subject is difficult and complicated; now the true Tory never pleads difficulty or ignorance until preparing to give way.

The Whig Opposition in Parliament has not yet assumed a definite shape. Lord Palmerston did his part well; and it is possible that, as a body, the ex-ministers may, before Parliament re-assemble, have learned, that an Opposition, to be effective, must be of a very different character from any party Opposition that has been seen in the House since the Revolution. The conflict must be one for principles, and principles alone, independently of factious interests or triumphs. Nor must the Whigs halt at Free Trade and the Abolition of the Corn Laws. The withering Finality doctrine must be abandoned. The experiment of Whigs ruling the country on Tory principles has signally failed. Even Lord Palmerston can now discriminate between the country and the House of Commons; between the constituencies and the People. There is a beauty even in one month's retirement from office; things appear in quite a new light. The ex-ministers, if not all ripe for an extension of the Suffrage, will certainly be more easily reconciled to the Ballot since the present Tory majority was returned, if they be not quite ripe for a mode of voting, which, when the Reform Bill was passed, they thought "had much to recommend it," and which was meant to be given, when it so easily might, as a necessary accompaniment to the Reform Bill. But the Whigs finding themselves so strong in the country, and not wishing to give the People more power than the nett quantity needed to keep themselves in place, afterwards repudiated the Ballot. They have now paid the price of their mistake; which is ever the best way of gaining useful experience.

Unhappily there is no immediate prospect of reviving manufactures, and falling corn markets relieving the severe pressure of distress, and lessening agitation. A dismal winter is in prospect; and, with the general suffering, discontent and agitation must increase; nor do we, as things are, wish to see peaceful agitation cease, whether Whigs or Tories be in power. It has long been the chief element of popular freedom; and until there shall be a large extension of the suffrage, gradually embracing all, and a pure electoral system, it is the duty of Reformers to keep agitation alive; not for its own sake, but as leading to improvement, through the only channel open to the mass of the people. Of the Corn-Law agitation abating, there is little chance. Hunger will keep it alive; many pressing interests require that it should be continued, and now it is openly encouraged by the late government. But although the corn and the other monopolies may be entitled at present to take precedence in point of date, there are principles to be agitated for, of equal importance. The Tories, under the guidance of Peel and the pressure of necessity, may extinguish some of the grosser monopolies; but neither Whigs nor Tories will, without a struggle, give the only effectual security for every reform that is required—for the permanent means of all improvement, whether fiscal, commercial, or social—namely, a fair, full, and free representative system, which, besides redressing past grievances, may prevent the recurrence of similar injustice under some new name.

VIOLET HAMILTON; OR, THE TALENTED FAMILY.

CHAPTER XXIV.

MR. CHARLES HERBERT having written to the father of the unfortunate Bigsby's widow, and in few words, but with all the address and delicacy in his power, appealed to his paternal feelings, was about to proceed to Mrs. Marion's dwelling to procure the necessary directions for forwarding his letter, and to consult this sagacious friend about the arrangements for the funeral of Burke Barker's victim. For in this light, Herbert could not help considering the provincial agent, admitting that he might in part have been the dupe of his own ambitious vanity and imaginary knowledge of the world, or of the arts of the designing.

Herbert had taken his hat to go out when Mr. Gryphon called upon him, with those morning newspapers in his pocket, containing the paragraphs quoted in our last chapter; though his chief object was to remind his young friend of the engagement he had made in his name for next morning with the Duke of Plantagenet, when all the matters in debate were to be concluded. When Herbert simply narrated his last night's adventures as they had really taken place, and in contrast with Mr. Burke Barker's gloss or "Romance in real Life," Gryphon, between amusement and anger, exclaimed, "Hang the fellow! he might compromise us with the Duke, if proper precautions are not instantly adopted: but I am a match for him. . . . He is, though, an infinitely clever rascal—and so plausible withal. . . . Ten thousand pities but that Barker possessed enough of the alloy of vulgar, common-place integrity to give his reputation tenuity sufficient to stand the wear and tear of the world's ordinary handling—I do not stipulate for sterling probity—high principle, nice honour:—a man gets on well enough without these qualities—we are no longer in the times of chivalry."

"Would not gold enough, without any alloy, do the turn?" said Herbert—"if my friend were believed to be really rich; if he were a good man?"

"Ay, indeed," replied Gryphon with a shrewd smile, "if he were a good man."

"Or if his knaveries were practised under the common conventional sanctions—if they lay in the safe line of stock-jobbing tricks—or gambling in Mark Lane, or in any sort of accredited scrip or omnium—anything that good men call speculation."

"Ay, ay, indeed," returned Gryphon, now laughing freely. "But don't be satirical, Mr. Herbert. How ill you understand business by the way! You University men never do, in the large way. However, Mr. Barker is effectually blown:—even in the House I don't believe he could have passed muster, although the Plantagenet interest had foisted him in."

"Who is satirical now, my good sir?"

"Simple fact of his Majesty's Commons, Mr. Herbert. . . . But there is no calculating upon the resources of a man like Barker, in a position which he understands so well as London, and all to which it is the key. If he issued proposals for a company for depasturing the mountains of the moon with Alpaca sheep, he would find people ready to take shares,—possibly a hot competition for them. Our retired suburban capitalists would peep through their glasses on the first moon-light night, and fancy the thing very promising, as they saw hills."

"And yet, Mr. Gryphon, I must regret him," said Herbert with feeling:—"With abilities so great,—accomplishments so brilliant,—a knowledge of men, but especially of the weaknesses and bad side of human nature, which looks like supernatural,—to see that man the slave of the lowest, vilest ambitions,—capable of the meanest, basest acts to gain a paltry object! There was a time when I should have been proud to be called 'the intimate friend' of Burke Barker."

"Hang his cool impudence! Your 'intimate friend!' From the commencement of his breakfast, until the conclusion of his lunch and his daily dutiful airing with her Grace and her poodle, the Duke potters over the newspapers till he has puzzled out an inconceivable deal of that daily trash, which it is astonishing to find him still taking for gospel. If he fall on this paragraph it may prove troublesome to our plans and your prospects."

"Am I not prudent in setting small store by prospects so easily damaged, Mr. Gryphon?"

"Nonsense! I won't hear a word of this; the thing can easily be put straight, although his Grace should scratch his shins over the stumbling-block laid in his way by the accomplished Mr. Barker:—pray hear me out," he continued, seeing Herbert about to speak,—“I tell you once for all, that I will take no refusal from you. I have appealed to the ladies. I trust to their superior and nicer discernment. Besides they are parties—principals indeed in the affair."

Herbert laughing at the pertinacity of his shrewd friend, at once agreed to this; and they walked together to Marion's door, where Gryphon left him.

When admitted below, he ascended the stairs very quietly, feeling that, if not in the presence, he was in the neighbourhood of sacred sorrow. Marion also gently opened her sanctum to his gentle tap. Her spectacles were on; she had been reading her Bible, which lay open on a small table by the darkened window. She pointed to the inner chamber opening from her watch-tower parlour, and made a sign of quiet; but when Herbert whispered his errand, so far forgot her own injunction, as to exclaim, though still in a suppressed tone,—“This is like yourself, sir!—kind and good; and ye were aye good and kind;—and the blessing o' the Friend of the stranger and the widow, and o' them that have none to help, will be about you, sir,—about you and yours.—Pusey, ye misheard limmer! will ye haud aff Mr. Charles.—Od, I'll take the tangs to ye. What cares he for your phrasin' and purring!"

"If example could make me good, if warning could make me thoughtful and thankful, I were the most grateful of men," replied Herbert in an earnest under-tone;—"but I do care for pussey's fondness, and her welcome of me;" and the heart of pussey's affectionate mistress glowed and melted as Herbert for a moment caressed her grimalkin, a condescension she did not fail to relate to Mrs. Charles,—politely remarking, while Violet laughed, "I would have thought nothing of it in you; but a grand, young gentleman, but the other day capering about in the Parks, or at the Clubs, or the hunts, like the other fashionable light-horsemen, sprauchlin' up to my garret to write a letter for a poor widow woman, and dawting my pussey."

For that poor widow Herbert meanwhile affectionately inquired, and was answered in the set terms, "As well, sir, as can be expected," to which, however, Marion added, "Wonderfu' weel, sir!—wonderfu', considering. Indeed I fear, Mr. Charles, that poverty is sometimes a great cooler of the affections. The forlorn thing is grieved for her silly gudeman, no doubt, but doubly so for the ill terms on which they parted yesterday morning, never to meet again on this side Jordan. Oh, sirs, but we are short-sighted creatures! If we could but look forrit a wee bit, what a check would that be on our angry passions, and bridle on our unruly tongues!"

"She must indeed be greatly depressed, poor woman," said Herbert, while he addressed the letter as Marion directed him.

"Ay, but on the other hand, I can see like a flickerin' o' consolation stealing through the darkness of sorrow, which is just so muckle the better. She maun be, and very naturally too, thinking now of her chance of being tenderly welcomed back to a bein, comfortable, parent-nest; and ye canna think of the diversion from grief—for I dare not call it comfort—that a bit widow's mutch, that's what ye call a cap or hood in Lon'on, has been to her, that I bought this morning, and the bit black brooch she had among her trash—the same Mrs. Snipson thought no' worth pawning."

Herbert now smiled, though gravely.

"And is not that just so much the better, Mr. Charles, that the feeblest spirit finds its ain suitable consolation. Now, if your dear young leddy had lost you, sir—which the Lord o' his mercy forbid!—what would the bravery of a' the widow weeds in Lon'on have been to her bereaved and broken heart?"

"Truly, these are gruesome images in a morning, Marion," replied Herbert, "especially to those bound like us on melancholy business. The Inquest is to be held at one o'clock, you are aware."

"Ye'll pardon me, Mr. Charles, but ever since I handed in my bit looking-glass, to let her try on her widow mutch i' the bed, and saw her study and admire her braid hems, I have been speaklatin' in my ain mind on the utility of dress and adornments to man, and especially to woman, in their fallen estate, or at least to the frivolous part of them. If there had been no Fall of Man from his original condition, what sort o' town, I wonder, would this same big Babylon have been? Ne'er a tailor, nor a mercer, nor a millender, nor a hair-dresser in it. There would have been a clean annihilation, or a non-existence, of the half of our present human avocations; and the things we prize the most would have been no more thought of than the baby-clouts that lassie-bairns busk their Flander dolls wi'. And what would have become of all my dainty lady's toilet-wark?—Weel may they ca' it toil-it, for hard and sair do they toil themselves, or their bond-slaves for them toil at it: decorin' the vile body—pettlin' up food for worms."

"Not so fast, Mrs. Linton," replied Mr. Herbert, rising to go. "The body is not so very vile; and I plead for the hair-dressers: even in Paradise, ladies would have braided their tresses,—Eve at the Fountain,—though perhaps their hair-dressers might be their lovers: and men will, I hope, shave their beards, even after the millennium."

"You are laughin' at a daft auld wife's clavers and nonsense, Mr. Charles; and, troth, I deserve it."

"No, indeed: but these are questions for grave Scotch divines; and now you must follow me to the Inquest in good time."

"And give Mr. Burke Barker back his siller—if he appear. To me, yestreen, he looked like a man not lang for this world. . . . My proud, natural heart rose in me, sir, at the thought of the poor woman he has bereaved of all, being beholden to him, were it but for a bodle. I have ordered a' thing frugally, but decently, at my own charge; and if I am not repaid by the freends, I have stood greater losses in my time."

Herbert admired this burst of honest spirit; while he said that he would arrange with the undertaker.

"Deed, and ye'll do nae sic thing, sir," cried Marion briskly. "This is to be my job. Besides, it's all already settled. Hoot, awa', Mr. Charles! d'ye think a young gentleman like you can deal with these sharp Lon'oners like me, that's been up to the trap of a' kin-kinds o' them for thirty year? Na, na; ye had your ain way yestreen, and I've have mine the day: time about is fair play, Mr. Charles." And the peremptory, and somewhat purse-proud old lady, jocosely shut her door, muttering blessings on her parting guest; and at the proper hour followed him to the Ship Tavern, where the Coroner's court had met; and where a reporter, who was a townsman and old school-fellow of the unfortunate Bigsby, had taken his place. One material witness failed to appear, and the reporter, to the great indignation of the Coroner, who hotly resented his interference, suggested that the Court should be adjourned till Mr. Burke Barker was compelled to appear, as he, the reporter, a barrister, on the part of the deceased, wished to put a few questions to that gentleman.

This suggestion could not be attended to. A note just then received, addressed by Dr. Edmund Cripps to the Coroner, mentioned that Mr. Burke Barker was seriously indisposed; that he had been very ill all night, and that fever was apprehended, affecting the brain, from which the greatest danger might result if he were in any way disturbed.

"I protest against the proceedings," cried the reporter.—"Is the testimony of a notorious, impudent quack, the brother-in-law of Barker, to defeat the ends of justice?"

"Take down his words," exclaimed a person present, who was supposed to be in the interest or pay of Barker's associates in the Bubble Company; and it was as certain that the reporter, as a lawyer, really had been sent by parties having a different interest.

While this squabble over the dead body of poor Bigsby is going forward, we shall look back upon Mr. Burke Barker, whom we left shivering and miserable in the cabriolet in which Herbert had compassionately sent him home. That home he reached in less than four hours from the time he had left it; but already what revolution was there!

Before Barker had gone out, there had been something in his conduct exceedingly suspicious and inexplicable to his sharp-witted, distrustful helpmate. When whispering confidentially with her medical brother about the delicate state and brilliant prospects of the Countess Emmeline, Mrs. Barker had kept an eye on her husband's proceedings, especially when he carried away his desk to his own room. He and poor Bigsby had not disappeared for three seconds, when, from actual experiment, Mrs. Burke Barker convinced herself that the cash-box, which usually stood on a small table in his dressing-room,—a box which had of late not been remarkably heavy,—was considerably diminished in weight. Papers lay strewn about, as if rejected, while others had been selected; and from the drawer of a chiffonniere, in which Mr. Barker kept some valuables and a quantity of nick-nackerie, several articles were gone. One of them Mrs. Barker, angry as it made her, in no ways regretted. It was the miniature of a pretty young girl, about which Barker, when rallied by his wife on its accidental discovery, could give no satisfactory account—about which he was grave, if not mysterious, though her brother Jack had told her that the picture of the girl, who so much resembled Violet Hamilton, was that of Barker's first love, and there was something more in the story,—"not," Jack delicately said, "for ladies' ears."

"That miniature gone! Then Barker certainly meditates flight!" was his agitated wife's audible thought, as she hurriedly rummaged on.—"What am I to do? Whither to turn:—the plate, the lighter valuables!—Those are safe yet, and for this night I am safe:—My mother,—I can depend on her services in this dreadful emergency. What a heartless wretch to betray and abandon me thus.—But how ever cared for me."

Uninformed of her crisis of her fate, Mrs. Burke Barker's ever, the presence of mind did not forsake her. The next two minutes her plans were taken. Her husband, a gay family, every member of which, from the youngest child to the attic, was devoted to pleasure. "Who fond of public amusements, it was a frequent custom to present the servants with tickets to a certain order of fancy balls. At the summons of the lady of the house, so soon as she had written a hasty note to her selected auxiliary, her active mother, and seated herself quietly and decorously at her work-table, the tall footman glided in like a zephyr, and presented to her the lighted taper required.

"Let the tiger take this note to Mrs. Crippes in Half-moon Street. By the way, Mr. Dobbs, the newspaper has just reminded me of a promise to my maid—to Miss Bish. She has not had three nights of pleasure since Jenkins went and she came to me. I promised that she was to see Fanny Kemble in Juliet the first time Fanny appeared in that part. . . . Now I am thinking that as Mr. Barker is to be at Great Marlow all night, with Lord St. Edward, and as the Countess is to spend the evening with me, I never could spare you all better. The cook is a Methodist, and wont go to "the devil's house"—she may send up the supper-tray, and the boy can wait. Now, Dobbs, you must promise me to take the greatest care of the girls—Miss Bish and the two housemaids and the laundress—and to be early home, not later than one or two at the farthest. I have for some weeks suspected a sly flirtation," continued Mrs. Burke Barker, looking exceedingly sly, and as the tall footman thought, uncommonly gracious. He simpered in coy consciousness, and held down his head, being still comparatively new to London service, while his lady, studying her watch, proceeded—"She is a nice girl, and I have a great regard for her; but you must both be prudent, though even if you were to marry, that need be no immediate reason for your leaving my family."

"You are too good, ma'am," replied the tall footman, bowing low, overpowered by his lady's condescension; "and I mean nothing but what is honourable to the girl, ma'am—nothing, ma'am," and he drew up his head perkily.

With a momentary glance of womanly contempt at this expression of the tall well-looking dolt's "honourable intentions" towards her clever and pretty maid—a person, woman as she was, so immeasurably his superior, as her mistress thought, Mrs. Barker proceeded with her own affairs.

Especially anxious to disarm the suspicions of her servant, should any be entertained, she said—"Well, make haste, and desire the girls to equip themselves. Bish must not be affronted at the other girls going along with you. I really cannot trust her alone. Dobbs—she is too pretty;" and this was said so roguishly, that Mr. Dobbs drew up his neckcloth, simpered worse than ever, and muttered, "O Lord, ma'am, beg pardon; surely you can't, ma'am, imagine—." So contradictory and conflicting a thing is human thought, that Mrs. Barker, though absorbed in her own important affairs, could have boxed her tall footman's ears for uttering the impudent thought which her speech was so well calculated to excite. She, however, only said hurriedly—"The carriage may set down the girls somewhere near the theatre, before it is put up for the night, and the coachman goes home, as usual;—only be prudent all of you. This sovereign will frank you all to the second gallery. I must not give you a taste for extravagance, now that, in con-quence of very heavy losses, Mr. Barker is limiting his expenditure for a time." Never had the delighted Mr. Dobbs seen his lady half so gracious and confidential, as he immediately told Miss Bish, when, jumping up at the welcome intelligence, she arranged her hair, exclaiming—"If we are only in time for the balcony scene!"

In ten minutes more the carriage, with four ladies inside, and Mr. Dobbs seated beside the coachman, was rolling on to the Haymarket. Miss Bish insisted on being set down at the very door of the theatre. She was not to be trundled off in the street, spoil her clothes, and perhaps lose half the balcony scene! That scene was long past; but there were others which detained Mr. Dobbs and his fair friends quite as long as Mrs. Burke Barker could have wished for.

The cook, besides her alleged Methodism, was suspected to love, not a glass, but many glasses, of gin, and, in consequence of this infirmity, had been seldom of late permitted to go beyond the precincts of the area; but the Countess was now momentarily expected to spend the evening with her sister, and being in a condition when ladies are privileged to have capricious appetites, and to eat at all hours, Mrs. Burke Barker graciously took her cook, who was a matron and a person of experience, into her confidence, and despatched her to the other end of London to hunt for a couple of whittings—two delicate whittings. She might go by any omnibus, or even take a coach, if necessary, but return without a whiting or whittings she must not, lest a future Duke of Plantagenet might bear a visible or hidden piscatory mark, in addition to his heraldic quarterings. The cook, curtsying for her crown-piece, promised to do her best, if she should knock up all Billingsgate, and proceeded on the way, on which Mrs. Barker, well loaded for one so little accustomed to porter's work, almost immediately followed; leaving her dwelling, the lights all blazing, to the care of Providence and the police.

Professor and Mrs. Cryppes, whose migrations, like those of the rest of their family, were frequent, had at this time no house of their own. They had occupied, since the high alliance contracted by their younger daughter, "genteel lodgings," taken for them by their elder daughter, in a good street off Piccadilly. As their style was now humbler, so were their hours earlier than those of the dashing Barker family; and not an hour after the latter had dined, the seniors were usually engaged at their nice little tête-à-tête supper. Let us now suppose Mrs. Cryppes thus engaged in her drawing-room, and her husband at a table apart, covered with sheets of music-paper, most intricately and elaborately blotted. The classical meal of supper is always the favourite repast of "the favourites of the public," whether players, musicians, or singers. Then the worrying business of their weary, if proud and brilliant, day is over, and then the exhaustion of both their physical and spiritual powers urgently require what Johnson pragmatically calls "the repairs of the table." Then, too, comes "the sweet of the night," which persons, whose vocation is the heavy one of universally pleasing, taste with such zest—the kernel of the twenty-four hours—whether the high-salaried theatrical Star banquet on the rarest dainties, and sip veritable champagne; or the "poor strollers," always social, procure a pot of stout to relish the Welsh rabbit or plate of sausages, over which they luxuriate. To Professor Cryppes supper had ever been the meal of the gods—social, jovial, musical, enchanting! but to-night he scribbled on, neglecting this favourite repast, to which his lady was doing all honour. "Will you put away these papers and eat your supper, Cryppes, or as sure as dickens, I shall order away the tray," said the professor's amiable partner, who had already had her full share of the lobster, and was deeply engaged with something equally nice.

"Be so kind as to mix me a glass of brandy and water—'screeching hot,'—and not disturb me, my love," replied the professor, not looking up, and scratching away, as for life and death, off and on those black lines, as if in a musical frenzy, "I have not had such a flood of sublime ideas for months."

"Stuff, Cryppes! has not your daughter, Barker, told you again and again, that in our present delicate relations with the Plantagenet family that opera of yours cannot be allowed to appear, although you could get it produced, which you cannot."

"I can, and I will, Mrs. Cryppes," retorted the indignant composer, "as soon as the necessary alterations are made. The loss of my original Prima Donna, Mademoiselle Gabrielle, now Mrs. Charles Herbert, has given me inconceivable trouble: but when the airs are arranged for—"

"Don't tell me such nonsense," interrupted Mrs. Cryppes; "you will always be fobbed off by some excuse or other—now this, now that; but the real reason is, the manager didn't give a fig for your piece, until the marriage of my daughter, the Countess—"

"Pray, ma'am, be so obliging as to hold your tongue," said the professor angrily; "you drive me stupid. . . . What an idea you have banished, Mrs. Cryppes!" and the disconsolate composer pettishly tapped with three fingers on his bump of music, and the other bumps in that vicinage, as if to woo back the evanescent or fugitive idea; then, throwing down his pen, he exclaimed, "It is vanished—gone!" He jumped up like a puff-ball, "Heaven! to what mischances are the rarest combinations of genius liable. Happy Beethoven, who could retreat to your den from vulgar annoyances! . . . You cannot, my dear, guess the infinite mischief you have done to-night." The professor swallowed his hot punch at a gulp.

"Fiddlesticks, Cryppes!" have your compositions ever produced one penny to your family? answer me that? The Plantagenet family—"

"Don't tell me, woman, of the Plantagenet family!" interrupted the angry professor, swelling and using vehement gesticulation. "My daughter has married a nobleman. I shall be the grandfather of a line of dukes. But there are more illustrious honours than these. Your husband is a man of genius, madam, whether you know it or not. What is the gaudy tinsel of nobility to the sterling ore of heaven-born Art, Mrs. Cryppes? Nature's nobility, Mrs. Cryppes: princes and sovereigns, madam, have bowed to musicians. My great Master, Beethoven, taught them to know their own place. See him on the promenade, the imperial family approaching! See Goethe! see the sneaking Poet, shrinking aside, and doffing his castor!—but the Master, what says he?—‘I crushed my hat more furiously on my head, buttoned up my top-coat, and walked with my arms folded behind me right through the thickest of the crowd:—the officials made a lane for me,—Archduke Rudolph took off his hat,—the Empress saluted me the first:—These great people know me. It was the greatest fun in the world to me to see the procession file past Goethe.’—There, ma’am, there! This is the homage which Rank pays to Art!”

“Now really, Cryppes, there is no enduring your nonsense,” interrupted the lady. “Stuff your mouth with your supper, pray. Would you ruin our prospects with your folly? Beethoven, indeed! Are you Beethoven?—And he was crazy too,—what did he ever make of it? Even seven hundred a-year, properly secured for my life, is something. Polly turns up her saucy nose to be sure, but I wish the great Mrs. Burke Barker may never be worse off. She would have me incite dear Emmy to fly in the face of that old rogue Gryphon’s pecuniary arrangements, and refuse to accompany her husband abroad with these cunning Herberts; but I don’t see what we would take by that. As well my daughter’s affections be seduced from me by those who can and will give us something, as by the Barkers, who would keep her all to themselves.”

Our Professor had experienced too many of the rubs of professional life, and the mischances of ambitious town adventure, to be altogether indifferent to prudential considerations, even when he talked the loudest of his exclusive adoration of Divine Art. But the longings of vanity, and any present gratification, always with him predominated over prudence, and a future advantage, no matter how great. To complicate his perplexity, a certain scheming manager—may the gods pardon him!—had this evening excited his inordinate vanity by a fresh proposal for his piece, and propitiated his previous anger by the blandest apologies, and promises to bring out his Opera, without delay, in the highest and most novel style of splendour as to spectacle, and with every advantage possible, from the first appearance in it of the most celebrated foreign singers that were to appear during the season. The compositions of an old-fashioned provincial organist of the school of Handel, did not promise much; but an opera by the father of a dashing runaway Countess, about to become the mother of a ducal race, was of some mark and likelihood to a man distracted to find popular amusements for an unamusable and capricious fashionable audience—a man in despair of having the boxes properly let. The overture of the manager, and the brilliant family prospects formally announced that morning by Dr. Cryppes to his exulting parents, had, coming together, been too much for the Professor’s brain, and the consequent excitement had produced that flood of musical ideas which had cost him, in the first place, the loss of his supper. Yet he was so far impressed by his wife’s representations, as to come down a peg, though he said, “If my daughter possess one spark of her father’s soul, Musical Art may, in the future representatives of the House of Plantagenet, find munificent patrons, and England may yet see something deserving of the name of a National Opera. If my humble contributions at the commencement —”

“Humble enough, upon my honour, Cryppes,” interposed the lady; “you have a head and so has a pin!—I wonder what keeps me from thrusting your whole trash at once into the fire! You have kept us beggars all your life with your folly; and now, when my daughter the Countess is about to help you to your bread ready buttered, you must fly in the face of the noble family. But if you are a fool, I am not;” and Mrs. Cryppes nodded her head many times with a most provoking air, as if she had taken some desperate but diverting resolution; and then, seizing the poker, she gave the fire an angry rummage, and flounced down.

A faint suspicion of the enormity, the petty treason meditated by Mrs. Cryppes against her liege lord, did steal over the mind of the Professor, but was dismissed as something too monstrous to be entertained. His sober reason suggested that the wife of his bosom was no more capable of the unheard-of crime of destroying his immortal master-pieces, though they might be imagined to stand in the way of a paltry pecuniary advantage, than to poison the great composer they were to immortalize; so, merely saying, with theatric dignity and stern emphasis,—“Beware, madam! beware, Mrs. Cryppes! there are bounds to forbearance”—the Professor had proceeded to the supper-table to finish his punch, when, enraged at the implied defiance and menace, Mrs. Cryppes sprang up like a sudden whirlwind, crying, “I’ll make a clearing of ’em once and for ever.”

The Professor’s first maddening impulse, as he dashed down the second tumbler which he had just emptied, was to assault his lady in a style going somewhat beyond the moderate correction of “his woman,”—by the “Baron,” sanctioned in such cases matrimonial by the authority of Judge Boller. Nor was it reason that restrained the impulse; but rather the self-preserving instinct of an author’s vanity, which made him, instead of assaulting his wife, dash his hands into the flames to rescue some part of the blurred and blotted manuscripts, which he threw on the hearth-rug, and danced upon, while his lady indulged in half-forced bursts of spiteful and triumphant laughter, crying, “Dance away, Cryppes! will you have music?” and she began to sing, and kept singing, until the poor man dropt upon the carpet as if suddenly shot dead. This made the lady change her note.

At this instant Mrs. Burke Barker, looking particularly bulky, entered the room wrapped up in her ermine-lined satin mantle.

“What, in heaven’s name, is all this? Is the chimney on fire? Is my father ill?”

"Only mad, I believe," replied Mrs. Cryppes, sulkily but faintly, and bending to assist her prostrate lord. "I merely—he provoked me so—threw a quantity of the lumber, with which your father will litter the place, into the fire—the scrawls he was to send to that cunning vagabond at the Opera House, to-morrow, who blarneys and butters him up for his own ends, that he is a Rossini, and a Weber, and all manner of stuff.—Get up, Cryppes, here is Mrs. Barker come." But Cryppes did not stir; and mother and daughter both became seriously alarmed, and the former violently.

"For any sake, mother, be quiet, and don't make a scene before the people of the house. Help me to raise papa, and he will do well enough; but first put this parcel carefully out of the way. How I wish poor Jack were here to-night, he could be so useful to me at this time. Stay, papa is coming round now"—she raised her father's head—"and you must call a coach—a roomy double coach, and come instantly with me, mother: I have things to tell that will horrify you." This Mrs. Barker hoarsely whispered, while bathing her father's temples.

"My daughter, the Countess!" half screamed Mrs. Cryppes. "Has Emmeline,—the abandoned wretch,—has she eloped, then?"

"Hush, mother, for Heaven's sake; you have another daughter, though you seem to forget that. Emmeline is well enough—safe under the wing of the Herberts;—will be well enough for herself and them, whatever becomes of me—of the most ill-used and unhappy woman, this night, in London! Barker has deserted me, mother!—I am certain he has,—without leaving me even a message or one sixpence!"

This affectionate mother half shrieked, "The d— villain!—but I always had a very bad opinion of him. He was so high and mighty, too—such a wonderful man—he despised my son, Jack—the best of all my children—my dear Quintin, who was ever affectionate and dutiful to me."

"You have reason to say so," returned Mrs. Barker, in a satirical tone.

"Hand over my salts, Mrs. Barker; your father is coming round; but he is so conceited and obstinate—he feigns ill just to tease me." The Professor was giving signs of returning sensibility, and Mrs. Barker, thinking chiefly of her own affairs, and no longer greatly alarmed for her father's condition, again urged her mother to accompany her—every moment was precious. "We can perhaps save a few trifles in the general wreck," she whispered, and Mrs. Cryppes pricked up her ears. "We shall lock up papa, and send Edmund to him as we go along. It was rash, though, to burn his compositions, poor old man! but he is coming finely round now."

Mrs. Cryppes, who had been a good deal flattered by his swoon or fit, and who was now assured of her husband's recovery, became enraged upon her own account. "Rash, Mrs. Barker!—rash, did you call your mother:—we are all rash betimes; but your mother will not be quite so rash as to accompany you in your pretty expedition, ma'am. D'ye hear, Cryppes! get up, will

ye. Your wonderful son-in-law, the great orator, Mr. Burke Barker, who was to be a Member of Parliament and a Lord Chancellor, has bolted; just what I always expected of him,—the great man!—the wonderful genius, that despised my boy, Jack—left his fine lady wife there, to go on the parish—for she shan't come on us, I can tell her."

"I have deserved this—but, mother, not from you!" replied the wretched daughter and deserted wife, in a hollow whisper; and she unconsciously put the empty tumbler, lately used by her father, to her parched and burning lips.

"Don't be so furious, Mrs. Barker," said the mother, in a calmer tone. "There, Cryppes, you are on your feet again; lean down on the couch, and compose yourself; what a fool you are, to be sure." Mrs. Cryppes was by this time revolving that if she lost her Professor, that "infernal screw, Gryphon," as she termed the duke's confidential agent, might fancy that a much smaller annuity, or retiring allowance, might serve for the Professor's amiable widow. "It was all your own fault, you know. But see the end of the Barkers—ha! ha! ha!" and Mrs. Cryppes laughed scornfully. "What claim have you on us, ma'am? What have you and your husband done for me or for my family, save to come between us and my daughter, the Countess, and her husband—your great and wonderful husband and you."

The overwrought passions of Mrs. Barker now first fairly gave way, and she fiercely exclaimed—"Yes, he was great—great and wonderful—my husband; and you have been his ruin among you—curse you for it—curse you all!"

Mrs. Cryppes, who now sat by her husband, affectionately holding his hand, stared at her furious daughter for a few seconds, ere she said,—"I fancied you had more sense, Polly. Be off now, and attend to your own affairs, I advise you,—if you can get a few trifles off safely, I shall try to take care of them for you, though if I were personally seen or in any way implicated in the business, my daughter, Emmeline—"

"My Emmeline, my child, my darling Countess," whispered the Professor, whose mind evidently wandered, and he fixed his vacant and yet wild eyes on his elder daughter. Then all at once, as if moved by sudden recollection, he half rose, as if going to the fire-place, and next smote upon his forehead.

"Now, Cryppes, no more of that nonsense, if you please,—I really won't stand it. What matter about that trumpery music, when here is your daughter deserted by her vagabond husband, like a parish pauper, and left to disgrace us all; what will the Plantagenet family—"

"Mr. Burke Barker fled!" exclaimed the Professor, overwhelmed by this fresh calamity. He had ever entertained the highest opinion of his son-in-law's abilities, and his gentlemanly character, as he called Barker's specious manners. While Barker's tone of character only cowed and angered his vulgar mother-in-law, whom he treated with hardly disguised contempt, he had inspired Cryppes with respect and something like affection,

"Mr. Burke Barker flee,—abandon his wife and his position!" he repeated, raising himself as if he had been thunderstruck, and fixing his inquiring, bewildered eyes on his daughter.

"Barker has bolted, sir,—this evening,—taking all the cash and valuables he could muster with him. Ask your daughter else."

"My mother lies!" shrieked Barker's frantic wife in the hissing whisper of a fury, "Barker has not deserted me,—he will do—he has done nothing to touch his honour; who among your Plantagenets—the alliance which he obtained for your daughter—is to be compared with Burke Barker?"

"Leave my presence, you bold, unnatural hussey," roared Mrs. Cryppes. "You will dare to call your mother liar, you audacious woman, you! A pretty wife Barker has had of you, to be sure! no wonder he has left you;—and you to sit there, Cryppes, and hear your wife insulted!—Have you the soul of a cheese-mite?—O, if my son, Jack, were here!" and Mrs. Cryppes proceeded to get up a sobbing fit.

"You will drive me mad among you," exclaimed the Professor, now grasping his aching head with both hands,—while his daughter, wrapping herself hurriedly in her cloak, as if it were armour against Fate, abruptly ran out and down stairs. This brought her mother suddenly to her senses, and she followed, calling in a voice wonderfully composed, or wonderfully pitched to the ear of the House,—the lodging house, "I am ready to go with you, Mrs. Barker. Let me get my bonnet,—the Countess will accompany us." She followed her daughter to the next coach stand, and, without another word being interchanged, hired a vehicle intended to do the office of a baggage waggon, while the Professor was left thus to soliloquize. "Barker ruined, and fled,—my son, Quintin, in disgraceful imprisonment,—but of that all Europe shall yet ring!—my daughter Susan degrading her family by a low marriage. And my opera!—my wife—But I repudiate her! Never again shall your mother, my Countess, share Professor Cryppes's bed or board.—Grandfather of a line of illustrious patrons of music. . . . Gad! there is some peg sadly wrong here," continued the wandering musician, tapping his skull, "I fancied I saw Emmeline before me,—my last hope,—the jewel of her house."

The Professor had fallen into the stupor of exhaustion, rather than into refreshing sleep, by the time that his lady and her daughter, so lately belligerent powers, but again united by a sound policy, had reached Mr. Barker's door.

To their mutual dismay he had preceded them; and the cab-driver, and afterwards himself, were now attempting to force admittance into the blazing, enchanted castle, which seemed to contain no inmate. Mrs. Cryppes, with ready ingenuity, would have thrown all blame on the servants, but Mrs. Barker, with farther-seeing sagacity, imputed the whole to a mistake, which she explained; and Barker, ready to sink, was far too ill and too wretched to make any observation, even when he perceived a basket of plate standing packed in the hall as if ready to be carried off. His condition—his return, which falsified all her own and her mother's suspicions, awoke some remorse, and even tenderness in the bosom of his wife, who, while she assisted him to throw off his still wet clothes—and to get to bed, and gave him water, for which he cried—could not help expressing her surprise and alarm. Had he attempted suicide?—he had certainly been in the water.

"Good God! Barker, have you been in the water? and you are burning——"

"In the fire and in the water," he replied. "But leave me in quiet, Maria—and don't, I entreat, let your mother near me—I shall be better to-morrow—don't alarm yourself needlessly—I was merely dragged into the water by the little madman with whom I left the house—and rescued, of all men, by Charles Herbert. . . . You will see it all in the morning papers. Good night, now—and don't sit up."

"Good night—but I must sit!" and Mrs. Barker kissed her husband's burning brow with something of pity and fondness, and secretly repented all her sins of that night against him, and hoped that something might still save them. "Barker was a man of such extraordinary talents—could make himself so useful to any party!"—and forthwith she went to listen to her mother's proposal still to secure the plate. It could easily be restored, if necessary,—but was better to be placed in safety, whatever should occur. Mrs. Barker offered no opposition; indeed the original scheme had been her own. She saw her mother depart, in the hackney-coach which had brought her, with a load of pillage, and then took her place in the room adjoining her husband's, to wait the return of her servants from the theatre, and send Dobbs for a surgeon.

Next morning the summons of the Coroner, served upon Barker, first apprized his wife of the fate of Bigsby; and in part accounted to her for her husband's distress of mind. She shuddered herself for an instant at the catastrophe.

The Coroner, notwithstanding Barker's absence, refused to adjourn the inquest; and indeed the evidence of the boatmen, and of Herbert and Marion, was clear enough as to the manner of Bigsby's death; and the verdict, "Drowned himself in the Thames during a fit of temporary insanity," was after all the true one; since it was no business of Mr. Coroner's to trace the causes which had produced the fatal temporary aberration of mind. Marion produced from her ample pockets a pair of scissors which might have represented those of the Fates, and cut off a lock of hair to give to the widow:—and then all was over; and in another hour the remains of poor Bigsby were added to the mouldering heaps of a London burying-ground. It was a mournful duty to Charles Herbert to attend as chief mourner. His only associate, save the undertaker's men, was Mr. Snipson, the tailor, who generously lost a couple of hours of time, and exposed his best black suit to the chances of a showery day, in paying this respect to his late lodger; or in "lighting a candle to the devil," as his wife described a piece of decent hypocrisy, meant to conciliate rich Mrs. Linton.

The various melancholy engagements of the morning had unfitted Herbert for study; and he lounged about in the Green Park till the hour he had appointed to meet at a bookseller's shop with Gryphon, and walk with him to Chelsea.

CHAPTER XXV.

Mr. Gryphon kept true tryst. He was very carefully dressed in his dinner suit, and looked in good spirits, and altogether remarkably well. Charles Herbert also recovered his spirits on their walk; and they sat down to dinner a cheerful and even gay partie quarrée, agreeing to put off the grand debate till they were assembled at the tea-table. Everything went off well. A showery morning had ended in a splendid evening, and everything was in harmony. Marion's Tweed salmon was perfection; the pretty, becoming cap, which Violet had constructed for Mrs. Herbert, was exquisite; and that lady, who liked pretty caps, and looked well in them, said, "It was almost too smart to be thrown away on old Gryphon." That gentleman, seeing to-day, in Mrs. Herbert, an ally in the furtherance of his project, looked upon her with unwonted complacence. He had long known that the spoiled widow of his client, the late rich East India Director, was a very pretty little woman, in excellent preservation, though endowed, as he thought, with sufficient hautour. But this day, Mrs. Herbert's manners to himself were as complacent and engaging as they had usually been distant and reserved, though scrupulously polite. She was even studiously complacent;—and a man who takes any interest in the discovery soon finds out when a woman wishes either to repress or encourage his attentions. He began to have a vague idea that he had always done Mrs. Herbert injustice, or that she was not the person he had fancied, but, in reality, the gentle, sweet, and serene feminine creature that her step-son's reverence and fond affection had ever indicated.

Mr. Gryphon had certainly not of late seen this lady to the same advantage. Since her residence at Chelsea, and changed mode of life, she had improved in appearance. Her delicate proportions were fuller and rounder; her complexion clearer and more delicate; her looks and eyes softer—and they were ever soft. Mrs. Herbert's meetings with Mr. Gryphon, since the death of her husband, had all been on business, and generally on annoying business; and she had perhaps owed the astute and cool-headed lawyer a slight grudge for his interference and disapprobation of the extraordinary will made by her husband, which left his son nearly dependent upon her generosity or whim. Now, this circumstance was buried among past things. She had lost with her fortune the power improperly confided to her; and the ever-remaining proof that she had not abused it, was the warm and confiding affection of Herbert and his wife for their step-mother, with whom they lived in the same freedom and cordiality as with a beloved elder sister.

Mr. Gryphon was particularly gratified by the lively words addressed to him, when, as he opened the door for the ladies to retire, Mrs. Herbert, smiling irresistibly, said, "Don't be long, my gallant ally—for I am resolved that, with your aid, I shall conquer."

He lost not a moment, after the gentlemen were left to their wine, of commencing—"I had no idea of how charming a woman Mrs. Herbert is—even yet."

"Even yet! my good 'sir," returned Herbert, laughing. "What does the chill qualification of, even yet, mean?"

"Why, she looks not more than twenty-seven; and must be, let me see——"

"My mother's personal beauty is her least charm.—I scarcely now, I fear, think very much about even my wife's fresher beauty. I somehow am in love with the one—and love both for their altogetherness."

"What a happy fellow you are, Charles!—you may well afford to forgive him, if an old bachelor, after a family visit of this sort, should be a thought envious."

"Not envious, but emulous;—get such a home for yourself—only as much richer as you like—and don't envy your friend," returned Herbert, believing what he recommended utterly impossible; though Gryphon deserved a good wife, because he was likely to make an amiable and reasonable woman happy.

"Mrs. Herbert wont to be, or else I imagined so, rather on the high ropes with me; but to-day she is more than civil, she is almost kind; and what a change does kindness to one's dear self make in any, the plainest woman!"

"Anticipating your suit, perhaps, and letting you perceive that she means to be gracious," replied Herbert.

"My suit!" faltered the usually steady lawyer, with the look of momentary confusion which is the nearest approach that a man of his character ever does make to a modest blush. Their eyes met; and Herbert, for once, read a lawyer's hidden and incipient secret in his gully face.

"Ah, you mean my suit for the Plantagenets," said Gryphon, recovering himself. "Ay! she is on my side, I know—one strong proof of her discernment."

"And there's more sympathy," quoted Herbert, laughingly; but Mr. Gryphon was musing over his claret. Though he called himself by implication an old bachelor, he had in fact been a widower for more than twenty years. The death of his wife had well-nigh driven the hard-looking lawyer distracted; and the calamity had not been surmounted for many years. The remembrance of his short-lived domestic bliss was still at times as vivid as ever; and such reminiscences had often, of late, been renewed, when, on a Sunday afternoon, he visited the Herberts. For many years Gryphon had been a systematic play-goer and patron of the drama in his own way. There had been a freedom and sociality about the theatre, after the labours of the day, which, when as yet gentle clubs were not, formed a kind of substitute for the domestic circle. But, as he grew older, he became fonder of his own fireside. Many of his early favourites had died out or disappeared from the scene; and actors were no longer what they had been. The taste of every inveterate play-goer is, in a great degree, conventional. No new actor, even though really superior, can ever fill the place of Liston, or Incedon, or Emery, or Kemble, or Abingdon, or Farren, to an old play-goer, whose first love they have been. In the approaching season, Mr. Gryphon had almost made up his mind to avoid the theatre altogether. It was becoming an annoyance to sit out a play, and painfully to contrast the new twinkling stars with the vanished lustres of Old Drury. Yet the prospect of his long solitary evenings was lonely; and one could not every night of the week play backgammon with old Joe Smith. Here seemed the very woman to brighten a home; though young-looking, not young;—found in a happy home that, though to it she lent so great a charm, could spare her to another where she would hold the first place. One of Gryphon's great matrimonial misgivings, for he had several, was on the score of temper—and here he was safe. His own outward bearing was not of the softest; and he could judge very fairly of the real tempers of men under all exterior; but he was afraid that in the lovely sex, under the most creamy and velvety, or sugar-frosted manners, ladies sometimes conceal qualities the most fatal to the forbearance, and ease, and companionable cheerfulness which was all he promised himself in a wife. But here were unimpeachable sweetness of disposition, united to lively intelligence and elegant manners, and a really remarkable share of personal loveliness—for her years. And Mr. Gryphon wished these were more, and her beauty less; for then his chance were the better of obtaining so delightful a domestic companion. But the modest Mr. Gryphon was, on the other hand, a lawyer, and a wealthy man, and he did not quite despair. This charming widow was comparatively poor and dependent; and her tastes were what is called refined, and her habits had long been expensive and self-indulging. Mr. Gryphon had too much sense and manhood to think of buying or bribing any lady to be his wife; but Mrs. Herbert, well and cheerfully as she had borne adversity, was, he knew, not insensible to those agremens of life, to which Charles Herbert and his wife, wrapt in the rapturous bliss of their mutual attachment—all the world to each other—still appeared indifferent. They might not perhaps always continue so, philosophers as they were,—and their mother had a better appreciation of the value of well-regulated luxury, as her present Plantagenet leanings demonstrated. Gryphon thought all the better of the lady for entertaining those tastes which he shared and could afford to gratify in her. So he mused, as he cracked fresh filberts; and remarked that his old housekeeper paid no attention to the dessert, which was always neglected where there was not a lady.

Herbert, who knew by experience, that Gryphon liked to give his friends a glass of good wine, and to indulge himself with one or more, now pressed another bottle of the best, and now very old, vintage of his late father's diminished cellar; but Gryphon, though praising the claret, protested that he would not be kept longer from the side of his fair ally. "If I had your motive to move, Charles, my friend, I should become a Frenchman—go off with the ladies, sir!"—which gallant speech Herbert instantly repeated in the drawing-room.

As soon as the gentlemen appeared, Violet took her post by the old-fashioned round-about tea-table used in this house—one of much ease, though of narrow dimensions and few domestics. She wished to cause no delay in the business of the evening, the gentlemen proposing to return to their respective chambers,—Herbert, to be ready for his studies in the morning.

Herbert made his stepmother take his wife's place at the piano, saying to Mr. Gryphon, "I am a stoic to music save when I steal out here to 'Paradise and the Peri,' so I cannot afford to lose a minute from the practice of my last new song. Play, mother, if you please, the accompaniment of my present favourite."

"Nay, Charles, you may surely select something more classic than that simplest of all simple Scottish melodies to entertain Mr. Gryphon: this is not the kind of music he will relish."

"I should not wonder if the play-house had corrupted his taste. Has it, Mr. Gryphon, taught you to prefer art, and low art too, to the loveliest nature? It usually does; but never mind, mother: we'll try to regenerate him. . . . The lady does not admire this simple style of music herself, to tell you truth, Mr. Gryphon; yet the particular melody is as light, airy and tripping as ever a Venetian canzonet. And my singing too," he added in a comic voice, and hemming, to clear his throat: "you should really come to us oftener, to learn in what the charm of social music consists."

"I wish the ladies would only give me leave," said Gryphon gallantly, yet with a touch of sorrow in the tone of his voice. "I may say with poor Lord Dudley—though my forlorn case is much less surprising—that there is not a house in London to which I could go for a cup of tea."

"O, for that," cried Herbert, "you are almost as over-modest—if it be not rather, 'the pride that apes humility,' in both of you—as Dudley himself."

"Am I to play this then, Charles?" inquired Mrs. Herbert, while Gryphon hovered behind her chair, as if meditating the outrageous gallantry of turning the leaves of the music for her. He however shrunk back, but still stood behind the performer.

"I presume, I must gratify this peremptory married gentleman," said Mrs. Herbert, while her jewelled, and very delicate fingers, glanced like sunbeams over the keys; and she turned up her side face with a winning smile, as if asking Gryphon for permission to gratify Charles.

The melody, played with great spirit and lightness, deserved all the praise that Herbert had given it; and his heartfelt expression did it all the justice which the most exacting Scot could have demanded for the sweetest lays of Burns. It was the well-known little Scottish song—

My wife's a winsome wee thing.

Mr. Gryphon was enchanted; he made Charles repeat the song—he attempted it himself, whilst Mrs. Herbert laughingly covered his blunders with the instrument, until he succeeded to the general admiration.

“Bravo!” cried Charles. “Try it once more;—if you are tired, Maman, I shall try to knock off the accompaniment.” “I can never tire of playing for Mr. Gryphon, if he really wish it,” said Mrs. Herbert, again turning up an animated and complacent face to the lawyer, and commencing again; and then the Scotch fell to be translated by her. Herbert had a notion that the scholar understood the language much better than his mistress, but Gryphon took his lesson with the most edifying gravity and interest.

She is a winsome wee thing—
She is a handsome wee thing—
She is a bonnie wee thing—
This sweet wee wife o’ mine.

“You understand this—the chorus, Mr. Gryphon?”

“I fancy I now do; but I understand no more of it.”

I never saw a fairer,
I never lo’ed a dearer,
And neist my heart I’ll wear her,
For fear my jewel tine.

“This is pretty plain too—lo’ed is the Scotch for loved; and——” Mrs. Herbert stopt, and cried out in some confusion, for Charles was smiling roguishly—“Take Charles for your dragoman.”

Mr. Gryphon protested against the change, but did not push the matter too far; and Charles took up the last verse to expound.

The world’s wrack we share o’t,
The ~~warble~~ and the care o’t;
Wi’ her I blithely bear it,
And think my lot divine.
For she’s a winsome wee thing, &c.

“Your ‘winsome wee wife’ will make your other wife give Mr. Gryphon cold tea, Charles,” said Mrs. Herbert, somewhat impatiently.

“I made tea too soon, fancying you bent on business—but it is pleasure you prefer,” said Violet.

“Are we not wiser!” replied Herbert—“but that last stanza was german to the matter of our present business.—It contains my creed. Long life to the peasant-bard who brought such philosophy to our firesides, and in a garb so fascinating;” and having sung the air so often, Herbert now whistled it, while Mr. Gryphon placed a chair for Mrs. Herbert, and sat down by his “fair ally,” on what she sportively named the Opposition benches.

“Well, lady and gentlemen,” she commenced, “since I have the honour to open the debate, I begin by avowing myself a Plantagenist out and out—ready to support my opinion à l’outrance.”

Mr. Gryphon’s eyes sparkled with pleasure and approbation, while he said—“And I say ditto to whatever Mrs. Herbert says; and will to the best of my ability, by solid argument, cogent reason, and lucid statement, support her cause,—though truth from her lips——”

“Oh! if you come to ladies’ lips, I say idle gallantry has no business with the question at issue:—at all events we are still two against two. You see, sir, how cheerful and happy a poor affectionate family we are. Is it wise, mother, to risk this ‘sober certainty’ for any perilous good that can be offered us? What say you, my winsome wee wife? You speak now.”

“Indeed, Charles, indeed, Mr. Gryphon,” replied Violet, blushing, and shaking her curls in her pretty infantile manner, when slightly embarrassed, “you know best—far best. I have no opinion—none but yours.”

“Most simply spoken, my dear little daughter,” said Mrs. Herbert, somewhat piqued; and turning to Mr. Gryphon, she continued—“These married folks, with their conjugal alliances, offensive and defensive, are more than a match for us simple single people, Mr. Gryphon. But can Mrs. Charles, being a married woman, have a voice potential in any important matter? Can she, being ‘under coverture’—under which term English law disguises woman’s slavery—have a vote independently of her husband? We are the majority still—two to one, Charles, two to one!” and the lively lady, in triumph, clapped the delicate hands which Gryphon would fain have made captive. He, however, contented himself with taking less by his motion, and only said—

“Pardon me if I cannot hear my profession impeached without defence. Woman is a great favourite of the English law, as I hope to be able to convince you, ma’am.”

The old lawyer seemed so much in earnest that Herbert was tickled by a sense of the ludicrous.

“Stand up for our shop, Gryphon!” he cried, sportively; “though it is hardly worth while to throw away an ingenious pleading; as I am certain that my mother, instead of a slavery, considers a well-assorted marriage as infinitely the happiest condition of every woman from sixteen to one hundred and six.”

A great deal of badinage of the same sort passed, and the business had scarce been entered on, when an event occurred which gave a new complexion to the whole matter. A carriage was heard drawing up at the door, to Mrs. Herbert’s great annoyance. She cried out, hastily—

“To tell the whole truth, though Violet has deserted me now, she almost promised Lord St. Edward and his wife, this morning, to accede, when they drove out together, to plead their suit. The young Countess is really an intelligent, interesting young creature. She is most anxious to leave London immediately, and do whatever the family of her husband thinks best; and he is the most charming, modest, ingenious youth I have ever met with in his rank. They seem fondly attached to each other; and we, in short, cannot withhold consent. . . . But who can that be? It is really too bad to be liable to such inroads at all hours. This is one unhappy consequence of our present rather humble if happy style of living.” She rose. “The Brabazons invited themselves to tea—but that was for to-morrow, I shall order that we be denied.”

“They are admitted already, I fear,” said Violet.

“Well, Heaven send me the luxury, if not of a regular fat porter lolling in my hall to defe my presence and premises from obnoxious intruders, then, at least, a footman, or even a housemaid, who can tell a needful lie. This is so tiresome! These are among those mortifications attendant on poverty, Mr. Gryphon, which I feel peculiarly. It was so different in my past times."

Before Mr. Gryphon could sympathize with a feeling which he was not sorry to perceive, the Scotch housemaid entered, to say, that she could not help disobeying Mrs. Herbert's orders, for that the young gentleman below would take no denial—"he seemed in the greatest distress of mind." The girl herself had caught the contagion of the visitor's reported agitation.

"I am sure the young lord ails something very bad indeed, ma'am. Ane need not light a candle to see true sorrow."

Violet instantly sprung up, crying, "Emmeline must be worse, she complained a little this morning."

"Lady St. Edward has eloped!" ejaculated Gryphon, true to his character of a lawyer, and a hater of all the house of Cryppee, without one exception. Mrs. Herbert looked shocked; and Gryphon added, "or the Duke is worse, and I am wanted. He had a touch of flying gout, and the announcement of another expected heir to his titles and estates ruffled him not a little. He will be pleased by and by at having one security more, though it come through a wrong channel."

"Not you, sir, are wanted, but Mrs. Charles," said the girl, eagerly; and Violet, obeying the natural impulse, ran down stairs.

ACTION OF THE CORN-LAWS.*

THIS Pamphlet proceeds from the same author whose letters in The Times, begun more than twenty years since, "mainly contributed," it is here stated, "to awaken public attention to this subject." But many concurrent causes have tended to this effect, though these letters are not among the least. We cite a paragraph or two to show the nature of the pamphlet:—

The Corn-Laws properly so called were enacted avowedly for the protection and encouragement of agriculture; that is to say, of tillage. We have in proof of this intention an old law, still on the statute-book, forbidding land once made arable to be laid down again in grass. It appears, however, that the landed-proprietors, seeing how well Corn-Laws properly so called worked to maintain and raise the price of the products of arable land, were not slow to come to Parliament and to obtain other prohibitory laws against the importation of the products of grass land.

It is impossible not to perceive that the intended extension of tillage, by means of the Corn-Laws properly so called, was defeated by these other Provision-Laws protecting grass-lands; and that the combined result has been an artificial high price of all the products of land, constituting a private tax on all the other classes of society in favour of landlords.

We never wish again to see the Corn-Law Abolition Question disjoined from that of the repeal of the other Provision Laws; viz. the beef, mutton, pork, bacon, butter, and cheese laws, or, landlords' monopolies. These kindred iniquities ought to be treated as one and indivisible. Here is another detached paragraph showing the spirit of the pamphlet.

Are the people to have employment and food, or are they not? The injurious claim to increase of tithe, with increase of produce, without having contributed to such increase, is as preposterous as it is oppressive—oppressive in the ample part it takes in preventing the extension of tillage, thus depriving the rural population of employment. Ministers of the Gospel, ask yourselves, what you are doing! What reasoning man must not be forcibly struck with the increasing scale of products, and of employment, from the common to the enclosed field, from the simply enclosed, to the ploughed and cultivated acre, and from the simply arable, to garden culture!

Away with the hypocritical sophistry, that it is useless to produce more food, and cheap food for those who have not the means to purchase it! Make laws which shall really promote arable culture, or at least abelish those existing laws which militate against it, and you will give the means of purchasing its products by the very employment you have given: this among, obviously and directly, the agricultural population.

This author does not believe that the abolition of the Corn and Provision Laws will have the effect of throwing inferior soils out of cultivation,—an idea which he deprecates and also ridicules. His arguments on this point ought to soothe the alarm of the landowners and their friends. Comparatively advanced as agriculture is in England, this author anticipates immense advantages from an open track exciting the agriculturalists to useful competition. Nay, he goes the length of thinking that some other countries have gone beyond us in really productive, if not in showy, agriculture. As our publication finds a way into many quarters where pamphlets are never seen (though the present is luckily a rather cheap one) we shall, from pure good will to the cause, borrow one more extract.

We will now compare the system of agriculture in some other countries with that of England, and their productive results.

Of the seventy-six millions of statute acres in the United Kingdom, there are about twenty-six millions remaining in waste and sheep-walks. Of the other fifty millions there are about thirty-two millions in natural grass, and only eighteen millions in tillage; that is to say, little more than one acre in tillage to two acres in grass; or in other words, that in every three acres, only one is cultivated.

We know, in a general way, that in the populous parts of Germany, the proportion of grass-land to the arable is about one acre in seven or eight acres. We know also in a general way, that in the populous parts of Italy, the proportion of grass-land to the arable is about one acre in every twelve or fourteen acres. In France it is

* Action of the Corn-Laws, and of the other Provision Laws, considered on the Principles of a Sound Political Economy and of Common Sense. By the Author of Letters in The Times, which, more than Twenty Years since, so mainly Contributed to awaken Public Attention to this Subject. London: Saunders & Otley, Conduit Street. 1841.

tistics have been more studied, and we know from the official cadastre, or modern Domesday-book, that the proportion of available land cultivated by the plough, spade, or hoe, is seven acres in eight, leaving only one acre in natural grass.

The Duke of Buckingham estimates the products of land in tillage at four-fold what the same land would yield in grass. His Grace, honourably unwilling to overstate his argument, has in fact understated it: for five-fold, six-fold, or more, might be stated on lands of superior quality. Much meadow land, if broken up, would yield with less expense of culture than a poor soil, sixty bushels of wheat per acre; or other products of proportionate value, whether in other corn, in pulse, in roots, or in the artificial grasses, such as clover, lucern, and others. This supposes somewhere about four thousand pounds of bread from the ploughed acre, against somewhere about, or less than two hundred pounds of meat, or its equivalent in cheese, butter, &c., from the same acre in grass. But we will adhere for the present, to the admitted estimate of a four-fold production. The account will then stand as follows:—

In England thirty-two acres of grass-land produce thirty-two parts, and eighteen acres in tillage, estimated to yield four-fold, produce seventy-two parts; in all one hundred and four parts from fifty acres.

In France one acre of grass-land produces one part, and seven acres in tillage, estimated to yield four-fold, produce twenty-eight parts; in all twenty-nine parts from eight acres; that is to say, one hundred and eighty-one parts from fifty acres.

If we trace the circumstances under which the results of the English system of agriculture are so unfavourable, we shall find the following to be among the most prominent. It is impossible not to admit the contradiction of laws prohibiting or taxing foreign corn, on the alleged motive of protecting and extending tillage, and of those other laws taxing or prohibiting foreign products similar to those of English grass-land: for tillage can only be extended by a diminution of grass-land. If the protection be equal, these different laws must nullify each other. But in the actual state of these laws, grass-land is especially favoured in addition to the advantage of the more difficult and more expensive importation of most of its similar products. The protection thus given to grass-land necessarily prevents the extension of tillage. What then is called for, is, that while the laws taxing or prohibiting the importation of corn are submitted to some well-considered modification, those other laws protecting grass-land should be repealed. A natural sense of justice seems also to claim, that tillage-land giving employment to the rural population, and grass-land giving no such employment, or comparatively none, the latter should be assessed in a greater proportion to the poor-rates.

The pernicious action of tithes on agriculture, and the author's proposed remedy, we pass over, to pursue the comparison between France and England.

It may be asked, why does not the greater quantity of the products of land make France a richer country than England? It may be asked, why France has not a greater accumulated capital at command? In reply to these questions, it may be asked, whether France be really a poorer country than England, not in respect of fictive, but as regards real capital? It may be asked, whether the general shyness in France to make use of the accumulated capital, does not arise from a want of confidence in the present order of things in that country; from the failure of the meddling attempts of its government, itself not inspiring sufficient confidence to remedy this shyness; and from national character prone to mistrust? It may be asked, whether the active superiority of England does not mainly depend on the confidence of its capitalists and commercial and enterprising men in each other, on the confidence in the stability of its government, and in the facilities arising out of its monetary system? It is not, however, to be passed over, that French operatives and labourers do less work, and consume more than the similar classes in England; and that here is a considerable check to comparative accumulation. It may be assumed, that the constitutional energy of the English character enables two English operatives or labourers, on a stinted subsistence, to do more work, on an average, in the same time, better and more skilfully, than three French operatives or labourers. Stinted subsistence is a heart-rending source of accumulation of capital: yet, where is the man who can lay his hand on his breast, and say, that this is not the actual state of things in England? In France, with some exceptions in the wastes and hills, the agricultural classes, comprising twenty-two millions out of a population of thirty-three millions, have, every man, woman, and child, two sufficient meals daily, besides occasional lunches.

Another argument continually put forth to establish a necessity for the extent of land in England allotted to grass, is the greater consumption of meat. But the advantage of tillage culture is not less in growing forage or food for cattle and sheep, than in growing food for the more direct use of man. The foregoing four-fold estimate is founded on the usual succession of crops: clover, lucern, and the other artificial grasses, as well as turnips, potatoes, carrots, and other roots, are products of tillage culture. According to the official returns of town-dues levied at Paris, the consumption of butcher's meat amounts to 148 pounds (English weight) per head annually of the population, men, women, and children; to this must be added a considerable quantity of fresh pork, independent of salted pork in all its forms and of poultry. The consumption is nearly the same in the other towns of the north and centre of France. Nor ought this consumption to create surprise, when it is recollected that meat is eaten twice a-day by the numerous easy classes, often more at breakfast than at dinner. Some cavil has been raised against the strict correctness of these returns of town-dues, but they must be admitted to be sufficiently near the truth, for the purpose for which they have been here introduced. If meat can be produced in such ample quantity in other countries by food and forage from tillage-land, it might be equally so in England. Practical agriculturists will admit this view of the question.

The reform which the United Kingdom needs, is, the modification of the Corn Laws, and more especially of those other Provision Laws, which, protecting the productions of grass land, militate against the extension of tillage, the main source of employment and of plenty in all great countries; the compulsory modification of the tithe system; and the modification of the actual system of taxation. To these may be added the modification of the Bank of England, of the joint stock banks, and of all the other banking establishments, and especially of all those of sufficient influence to call at any time on the government or legislature for protection, by a suspension of their engagements to pay in intrinsic money. When these things shall be effected; when our green fields shall be broken up, and be made to produce four-fold or five-fold, or six-fold, as ploughed and cultivated land; when our best soils shall be in fertile tillage, instead of in their present comparatively barren state of grass: then shall there be employment for the rural population, without apprehension of its increasing numbers; then shall our thriving manufactures, growing with the increased demands of the rural population, double also the home-market for the productions of land; and then shall landlord's rents, made to depend on the most productive cultivation, instead of on the artificially high price of a small quantity of products, be established on a firm basis, with the certainty of progressive increase, to be paid, too, in intrinsic money. It is in the nature of worldly things, that in the midst of general prosperity, landlords must always be the most prosperous.

So concludes a pamphlet which we warmly recommend. The intelligent author is neither a manufacturer's man nor a wild man. He views the matter soberly, and turns it on all sides.

A CRY FOR BREAD.

A cry hath gone forth, a cry wild and dread,—
The cry of a people that famish for bread;
Shall its voice be regarded, shall justice prevail,
Or alighted and scorned, shall it die on the gale?

With the first breath of morning its whispers unite,
With the vigour of noon-tide it mingles its might,
In the still hour of sun-set its vows are preferred,
In the depths of the darkness its curses are heard.

It comes from the hamlet, from sons of the soil,
It comes from the city, where artisans toil,
It comes from the hearth of the widowed and poor,
It comes from the millions who will not implore.

It asks not for pity; for charity! No:
It seeks not those mercies that mortals bestow;
It calls for those rights by Omnipotence given,
It demands to have bread, the provided of Heaven.

Hath it not been proclaimed, hath it not been fulfill'd?
"The earth is the Lord's, the earth shall be till'd,
And seed time and harvest shall ever endure,
Thy bread shall be given, and thy water be sure."

Let the full dare deny, let the infidel scoff,
The earth is the Lord's, and the fulness thereof;
The valleys that dance, the life-teeming rills,
The cattle that graze on its thousands of hills,

He spake them to being; He bade every field
Of herbs and of fruits, their abundance to yield;
And to man gave the right, in the hour of his birth,
To eat and to live on the face of the earth.

No boundaries He traced, no confines He plann'd,
No limits He set, in His gracious command;
But, wide as the world, His unchanged decree,
"O'er the face of it all, shalt thou eat and be free."

One only condition:—"By the sweat of thy brow, Shall the earth give her increase, her fatness bestow."
'Tis the curse of thy crime, "Thou shalt toil ere thou eat;

Though bitter thy toil, the reward shall be sweet."

But a cry has gone forth, a cry loud and dread,
The cry of a people that famish for bread;
The created conspire the Lord to defy,
Or to toil, or to eat, to the myriads deny.

The babe at the bosom imbibes but the air;
The child prays in hunger—who answers its pray'r!
The old beg for food,—what echoes!—anon!
Can the son and the parent, unmoved, look on?

They have hearts; do no feelings of Nature dwell there!
They have minds; say what thoughts to those temples repair!

They have veins; does no strength in their currents abide!
They have arms; were they made but to droop at their side!

Shall the earth grow to seed, and they pining for food!
Shall the sun shine in vain—the rain bring no good!
Shall the seasons roll on, nor blessing bestow!
Shall the promise of God be perverted to woe!

And who are the worms, exulting in pride,
Who, basking in wealth, feel to greatness allied;
Who will not consent that their brethren should toil,
And eat and rejoice in the fruits of the soil?

Are they servants of Him who descended from high,
Who came to the poor, that the poor should not die;
Who taught man to pray day by day for his bread;—
Who bless'd, and the multitudes hungry were fed!

His name do they bear!—his precepts approve!
"A commandment I give—one another ye love,"
Yet devour widows' houses, and hand join in hand
To spread devastation and death through the land!

Oh! woeful the hour, and woeful the day,
When the millions stand forth in their fearful array,—
When no longer they ask for permission to toil,—
When by force they assert their birth-claim on the soil!

In the caverns of space the foul-fiends convene,
And the storm and the tempest there mantle unseen:
More solemn the calm, more direful the blast;—
O, who shall rejoice when the hurricane's past!

But a voice has gone forth, a voice loud and dread,—
The voice of a people that famish for bread:
To heaven it ascends; shall it rise there in vain!
Will not God, in the conflict, the righteous sustain!

CONQUERORS.

A GLANCE AT HISTORY.

They flash'd like meteors through the rack,
Flinging brightness round their track—
A purple glory, such as streams
From tropic sunshine's parting beams,
Mantling the waste at daylight's close
With richest blush of Eastern rose.

Go, studying lump of breathing clay,
And scan millenniums pass'd away;
And o'er the waste of perish'd years,
What worth thy ardent gaze appears!
What but the great mankiller's power,
The splendours of the conquering hour!

Who heeds the wreck of human joy
When conquering satraps shout, "destroy"!—
And what 's the worth of million groans,
Of flaming towns, and perish'd thrones!
But added ruby light to fling
Around the forehead of a king.

With kindling eye and throbbing heart,
Go thread the maze of history's chart;
Track age on age of glory, bright
With battle's wild and bickering light;

And what amid the blaze appears!
One conqueror girt with million spears!

Earth, with its mountains and its floods,
Luxuriant plains, and waving woods,
Its sunlight, and its thousand springs,
Its myriad haunts of living things,
Is but a scene where wildering plays,
Of victory's light, the lurid blaze.

From Nimrod, seek to Zenghis Khan,
The mystery of life in man;
From Irak's prophet search ye on To myriad-starred Napoleon;
And own 'tis folly closed in death,
The sport of every conqueror's breath.

Historian, what the boon so vast,
On human kind thou lavished hast!
Is it that o'er a nation's name
Thou fling'st some mighty felon's fame!
And o'er the dust of empires blent,
Thou rear'st a Cæsar's monument!

COPLA. ANON.

—“It is often alleged that the present appearance of life is prosaic. This is a vague term at the best; but here it may be understood to imply, that in the actual state of things there is little to excite the imaginative, in contrast with the logical faculties:—no element of grace or variety;—and that it rarely presents us with anything very characteristic, strange, or beautiful. I could never bring myself to admit the truth of such assertions; believing that poetry, the opposite to prose, is an element of the inmost nature of man,—and that it cannot, as these complaints would seem to imply, fall away, like a mere mask, from the shrivelled face of life. On the contrary, instead of a factitious and outward covering, dependent on accident or time, it should rather be deemed an ingredient in the heart’s-blood of human nature, pervading it with infinite and inscrutable currents, and colouring its complexion as long as it continues to exist. There is no doubt that the face and relations of society have undergone great changes within the last century: and that we should now seek in vain for many of the forms in which older poetry delighted. If we would pursue the marvellous or the affecting, they are to be found in other ways than those where they used formerly to appear. The striking colours, the contrasts, the vehement display of individual character and passion, which once arose on every hand, are now scarcely visible. Of this external dress the picturesque of life has indeed been deprived. But it is not to be inferred from hence that the real body no longer lives or speaks. The language is not extinct; its symbols, although changed, are still intelligible, they are daily read by all: but we are not yet accustomed to the new manner of speech, and therefore call it by a number of strange names.

I do not pretend to translate its many characters: all that I maintain is their certain existence. A clear eye may even now detect them; and, before long, their meaning will be as generally known as that of any earlier writing traced by the finger of poetry on the sand whose grains are human lives. But I would ask—are all the old letters quite worn out? Before this is affirmed, let us recall what we may have observed in others or have ourselves felt while agitated by any strong passion, when pining with desire or sick with expectation; and reflect whether all the utterances of these were nothing but bare prose. We may inquire what is the key to those emotions so mysteriously awakened by the presence of some objects or the hearing of certain sounds,—whence proceed the different influences of the seasons of day and night,—and what is that which so remarkably quickens the senses in any object greatly loved or hated? Some may have witnessed the sudden rising of a crowd, even of the rudest, to a height of emotion far above their ordinary level, when touched by a master’s hand:—what fibre of their natures does this electrical impulse set in motion? And, to end with a matter familiar to all, what are the wonders and pleasant devices exhibited, to the veriest clod in being, by the spiritual agency of sleep?

To me the last named class of appearances alone would give a sufficient reply. I ought, however, to confess, that I have always attended to them with singular care and delight, as a willing believer in the auguries of dreams; and not without reason. It would not be difficult to prove, by arguments drawn from the phenomena of sleep, that a hasty ridicule of this assertion would be unbecoming in a philosopher. But here I have nothing to do with controversies; and shall simply declare that, besides the mere enjoyment of charming phantasmagoria, which have accompanied my sleep since infancy, I have more than once experienced the presence of a more important agency in dreams. Thoughts and inventions, which the world has received with some favour, have continually been imparted to me in this way; glimpses of coming occurrences (although more rarely) have been discovered during sleep; and dispositions and acts, influenced by the recollection of a vivid and affecting dream, have determined more than one cardinal event of my life. To some of these I recur with untired interest, recalling the strange delight which they gave at the time, and the passiveness of my obedience to their suggestions,—not without wondering, both then and now, at the consequences thus produced. One of such instances occurs at this part of my history; and, as it greatly affected the happiness of my remaining life, it must be related in some detail. The grave and indifferent may as well skip a dozen pages; but I hope the while to convert another class of readers,— to the belief that all is not yet bare prose, even in the commonest existence.

Leggiadri amanti, e donne innamorate, Vaghe d’udir piacevol cose e nuove,—

I therefore proceed to relate what happened in this Autumn of 1817: the year in which, it will be remembered, I became of age, and succeeded to an independent fortune, which, if not considerable, was at least competent. I left in London a home full of cheerful faces, and a pleasant circle of acquaintance, to travel on the continent, with all the buoyancy and thirst for change and adventure.

which belong to youth, health, and sanguine spirits. On my way to embark at Southampton, I turned aside for the festival which was held in that year at Salisbury; having always been allured by music, wherever it was to be heard. The scene was calculated to raise even the dullest spirits. The city, although not absolutely beautiful, is at all times redeemed from tameness by its noble cathedral, which, in site, has so much the advantage of York. In this finest of all fine Autumns, the streets and the surrounding meadows were alive with throngs of holiday people, and crowded with the beauty of three counties. I have always thought that the English gentry show more disposition to be gay at the celebration of these festivals than at any other season;—perhaps because it is a pleasure both national, aristocratic, and time-honoured:—at all events, unless it was the light of my own spirit, which was reflected upon them, I never saw more of the appearance of enjoyment than in the assemblage of notables and beauties gathered at Salisbury on that occasion. The music was unusually good; and there was so much on all sides to amuse and occupy me, that I did not remember, until the day of the fancy-ball—the last of the festival—that I was without a companion or an acquaintance in the place. On this occasion, however, the sense of loneliness was not agreeable, as it was not enough to feast my eyes only on the engaging Bohemians, Cowslips, and Erminias, that flitted about on the arms of various exotic characters, looking (as my dear countrymen always do on such occasions) miserably ashamed of themselves. The coup d'œil was sufficiently effective; but the eye grew tired of the never-ending change of motley, and longed to rest on “some bright particular star.” Mine I soon discovered: a girl, hardly seventeen, in the costume of Titania, as I supposed, from her gauze wings and silver wand;—and it happened, when I first noticed her, that her partner, who had adorned his head and jaws with some species of remarkable hairy contrivance, struck me as an admirable substitute for the wearer of the ass’s nose. The dress suited the character of her face, which was exceedingly arch and winning, with an expression of brilliant gaiety quite dazzling; and she danced with a lightness of foot, which would have done her credit at a revel in Fairyland. I placed myself where I could observe her uninterruptedly, and was soon enamoured of her appearance to such a degree, that I grew fierce at seeing her dancing and laughing with others, while I, who was dying to approach her, could not find a soul to help me with an introduction. Chance, however, befriended me at a later period of the evening, when the opening of the supper-room, the access to which was through a passage or lobby, both narrow and crooked, set in motion the hungry paraders. In threading this mauvais pas, I was turned quite round by the sudden rearward charge of a very fat lady in a turban; and, lo! there was my Fairy Queen, separated from her party by the crowd, and cowering in a corner, with looks, in which timidity and amusement seemed to contend. It was only a positive duty to approach her, for she ran some risk of being stifled: to address her cost me no little effort. I was confident enough in those days, but there was already awakened within me, by this lovely girl, something of that emotion which makes the most audacious timid. However, I summoned all the courage I could command, and (being in a troubadour’s dress) accosted her with some attempt at the manner suitable to the assumed character of both, while I endeavoured to proffer my service, which really was needed, until her friends should find her, as earnestly and respectfully as I could. At first she seemed doubtful whether she would at all allow it or not; but either fear, or the tone of the address, decided in my favour; and, by degrees, as for the time it was hopeless to think of stirring, her shyness wore away. No sooner was this restraint removed, than our conversation became very sportive and animated; and, as I persisted in treating her as the Elfin Queen, she enchanted me with the spirit and fancy of her replies, although my self-love was not spared in the lively sallies with which she encountered my rhapsodies. In half-an-hour I was completely at her mercy,—utterly piqued and captivated to such a degree that there was hardly any folly which I should not at the moment have been ready to commit, if it would have prevented her from defeating my wish to pursue her further. The moments were escaping, and I attempted in vain to discover who she was, and where she dwelt. Approaches which I thought dexterous and sudden were evaded with the utmost ease. I saw that from a circuitous course I had nothing to hope; and at length was compelled in direct English to entreat that the Fairy Queen would tell me what was her name by day. To this plain request was returned a laughing, but peremptory denial, although I declared my own address and denomination, and used every means of supporting my petition that occurred at the moment. At length, with a sudden expression of the gayest naïveté, she said: “You are a stranger, then, in Salisbury?” “A mere bird of passage,” I replied. “And leave it for Provence or Palestine?” “To-morrow,” was my answer, although I rather designed to remain. “Oh!” she continued hastily, “why should you then have been so troublesome?—if you had resided here, some one would surely have been able to introduce you to Miss Vane.” “And if not,” I said, “will you refuse to speak to me again?” She did not immediately reply, but seemed as if she had discovered some flaw in the medallion of her bracelet; and the instant she raised her eyes again, exclaimed: “Oh, there is my party!” and had disappeared between two Polish nobles and the devil, before I could ask another question, or persuade her to reply to my last. At the same time, the group which had covered her retreat drew nearer, and I was seized by the Prince of Darkness, in whom I had some difficulty in recognizing my school-friend Tempest—(the same whose adventure with the gipsy I have already related elsewhere.) He was a native of the city, but had only run down from his chambers in the Temple to be present at the ball, which explained our not having previously seen each other during the festival.

"You are the very person I could have wished to meet," I said, almost before he had time to express his surprise at finding me in Salisbury. "Can you tell me who is Miss Vane—the young lady that ran past you this instant—where does she live?"

"O yes," he answered, laughing; "but what can you possibly have to ask about her? I saw her just now, looking quite charming, with a skewer or caduceus, or something wonderfully like either, in her hand. She lives in the Cathedral close." I was about to ask for more information, when he caught a glimpse of some lady at a distance; and, most inappropriately exclaiming, "Thank God! there is the Madonna once more!" was out of my reach in a moment. I could not find the Devil or Titania again: the hour was growing late, and I supposed they must both have left the rooms.

It seemed that Tempest knew the lady. His family, with which I was not acquainted, lived in the city; but through his means I doubted not to obtain an introduction to her. It was some time, however, on the following morning, before I could discover the residence of his friends; and when I arrived there, I learned that he had departed for London by the early coach, so that my hopes in this quarter were at an end. After some deliberation, curiosity and eagerness got the better of reason, and I determined to invade the dwelling of my enchantress with no other guide than my own assurance. Whether she might have father, brother, or duennas, I did not at the moment trouble myself to discuss. I was resolved to speak to her again, if possible;—vanity suggested that my presence would not be unwelcome, in spite of her assumed coyness; and youthful impertinence added, that if young girls will frequent fancy balls and ravish the hearts of all beholders, they cannot expect to be left alone. By considerations such as these, I comforted myself on the way to the close; and before I reached the house, which was readily pointed out to me, I had decided that the course I had taken was in the highest degree natural and becoming, if not exemplary. I confidently inquired for Miss Vane, and was admitted.

The appearance of the room was not such as I could have expected to find in the dwelling of Titania. It had not a trace of the prettiness and elegance, which in some thing or other are rarely wanting in a place frequented by a refined young female. Everything looked cold, and pinched, and dingy. There were tall chairs with straight backs and faded cushions; a harpsichord with thin decrepit legs, looking a picture of shabby old age; and the mantel-piece was adorned with large shells, and pitchers filled with everlastings. On glancing at the walls, I was disheartened still further by the sight of much framed worsted work. I began to fear that I had made some mistake. In the midst of my qualms a creaking foot was heard in the passage—this could never be my fairy's!—the door was opened, "and Telemachus knew that he beheld Minerva!"

A tall gaunt figure, that had once perhaps been fair, and might formerly have been young, advanced into the middle of the room; and after a formal courtesy, stood expecting my address with a look of severe inquiry. The disappointment was painful—the position nearly desperate. I felt its absurdity, which was worst of all. "I beg your pardon, but it was Miss Vane on whom I have taken the liberty of waiting," was all I could say.

"I am Miss Vane," she replied with a voice like that of a macaw; "please to state your business."

"There is surely some mistake," I said—"some misunderstanding—your sister, or niece, perhaps; she was at the fancy ball, dressed as Titania."

"Sir," answered the spinster, with much bitterness, "I have neither niece nor sister, and I was Titania, although I do not see what concern this may be of yours."

The trick that had been played upon me flashed upon my mind at this moment. It was a piece of deliberate wickedness on the part of my fair tormentor. I made an awkward attempt to cover the necessary retreat from this false position.

"Exactly," I said; "I fear I have expressed myself imperfectly. May I solicit a description of your costume, to appear in the list of the company which will be published in the Journal of Monday next?"—thinking myself very clever that I had recollected the name of a paper which I had seen at the inn; but here, also, I was unfortunate.

"This is some deception," rejoined the stately lady. "I have already been visited by the Editor, whom I know, and I suspect your intentions." Saying this she advanced a step nearer, looking at me with an expression of countenance which made me fear a seizure of my person. I was too much alarmed to reply, but bowed, and passing by her, fairly ran out of the house, without stopping until I reached my hôtel.

Here I had leisure to reflect on the absurdity of my conduct, and the mirth which I had doubtless provided for the mischievous little fairy; it was a punishment of my coxcombry not the less unpalatable, because I felt it to be deserved. I had not even the satisfaction of discovering the name of her who had fooled me so completely. In a small neighbourhood like this, the matter was sure to be made public, as the festival guests had now left it to its habitual dulness; yet I lingered there for two days longer, in the vain hope of catching a glimpse of my sweet enemy; but she was not to be seen; she had probably been merely a passing visitant, although she must, I concluded, have some acquaintance with the people of the city. For before I departed, I learned, from cautious inquiries, enough to see how well the instrument of my discomfiture had been chosen; the lady being celebrated for sourness of temper and unwilling maidenhood, which had on more than one occasion been vexed by mischievous pleasantries. There was nothing left but to digest the mortification as well as I could, reserving the purpose of an adequate revenge, in the improbable event of my ever meeting its author again; and to proceed on my way to France. As my vexation subsided, the recollection of her beauty and wit regained the ascendant, and in a few days I liked her all the better for the dexterity with which she had chastised my presumption: a little longer, and the entire adventure effaced from my mind by other scenes and impressions.

Here, to continue the thread of the narrative, a period of five years must be passed over, the details of which will be resumed elsewhere. A short interval like this, when chequered with sorrow and mischance, is sufficient to work a startling change even in the most sanguine natures. No one who saw me return to England in 182-, would, I think, have recognised in the silent melancholy-looking man, timid and grave beyond his years, the same person who was so forward and light-hearted at twenty-one. Death had made my home utterly desolate; sickness had barely ceased to drain the springs of my life; friends whom I had served and trusted had deeply injured me; and the pressure of some most harassing cares had subdued all elasticity of spirit. I was saddened by a review of the past, nearly aimless as to the future: it seemed as if my part was already played out, and that nothing remained but to drop the curtain. All that I had most loved was gone; my cherished designs had been disappointed, and the energy to advance in some other path was for the time wanting. I had, therefore, no refuge but in the scanty pleasures of the recluse, which have at least the advantage of being easily found, and little interfered with. These were the conclusions of a sick mind, impatient of the hard lesson which life teaches, and refusing such pleasures as it may still bestow, because it has taken those away which were chiefly desired. The young, who are early tried with sorrow, rarely escape from this disease; but it is one which, if not too hastily encountered by some desperate act of rashness, is gradually relieved by the fresh growth of existence within. It is only the aged mourner to whom time and the hour bring no alleviation.

There was a visiter of the news-room which I used to frequent at Southampton, who appeared to be nearly as much of a stranger there as myself: a tall, eager-looking man, with a fine head thinly covered with white hair, careless in his dress, but with the unquestionable air and bearing of a gentleman. He seemed to be, like the subject of Béranger's song, curieux et nouvelliste, to an extreme degree; for I was sure to find him devouring all manner of newspapers, in his seat at the back window, at any hour between ten o'clock and noon. The accident of my preferring the same corner, the exchange of a paper, or some trifle of the kind, introduced us to each other. I found him intelligent and well-mannered; and as we continued to meet in the same place, an acquaintance gradually grew up between us. His remarks betrayed some reading and considerable knowledge of the world, with a vein of cynical humour, which was rather congenial to my own mood at the time. On one occasion, as we happened to leave the room together, the mention of a particular book led to an inspection of my library, which was a good one; and the manner in which he fastened on its choicer contents increased my liking for him. A common interest of this kind, and the weariness of utter solitude, disposed me to find pleasure in his society; and our intercourse, without any warmth on either side, by degrees became closer. For some months we met almost daily, and I received him as a frequent visiter at my lodging, without ever caring to know more of his history than that he was called Everard, was a widower, and resided in a house of his own not far from the town. At first I could not divine why he should have such a liking for my company, moody and taciturn as I then was prone to be; but I soon discovered that he came as much for the sake of my books as on my account. But as he was a pleasant and gentlemanly companion, I did not take any offence at a circumstance which relieved me from the effort to be entertaining at times when I happened to be more depressed in spirits than usual.

It was towards the beginning of winter that our meeting in this manner ceased. Mr. Everard no longer appeared at the news-room; nor did he visit me, as usual, to return the last book which I had lent him, and ask for some other. His presence had become so habitual to me that I felt annoyed as day after day passed over, and no one came to interrupt the solitude of those long November evenings; yet I was reluctant to inquire after him at his own house, so entirely had the wretched disease of shyness and unsocial distrust taken possession of me. The privation, however, filled up the measure of my weariness in the place; and in a sudden fit of energy, inspired by petulance, I packed up my wearables for Brussels, where I had still some acquaintances left. So impatient was I to fulfil the purpose of instant departure, that I determined to proceed at once alone, leaving my servant to follow, after he had disposed of my books and other valuables in proper custody. On the night before the intended journey, having taken a place in the London Mail of the next morning, I was visited by the first dream which concerns this part of my story. A little before day-break there came over me a feeling of delicious repose and cheerfulness such as I had not experienced for some years, whether waking or asleep. I seemed to be surrounded by an atmosphere of pearly clouds, like those which return the last rays of the moon when the sunrise is just at hand; and it was full of the voices of those whom I had lost, which were whispering to me on every side, with a softness that deprived me of all sorrow as I listened to them. Gradually the sounds became confused, and melted into a murmur like the faintest tones of an Æolian harp; at the same time the clouds were drawn aside, disclosing a sky of an intensely deep blue; and from the midst of this heaven there gazed down upon me, with looks of longing tenderness, a face, the sweetness and charm of which sank into my very soul. I cannot describe the expression of gracious and earnest affection which animated every feature; but the eyes especially, were soft and almost passionate in the regard which they fixed on mine. It was this expression alone, combined with a kind of spiritual grace, that belonged to the world of dreams,—the countenance I had seen before, but had utterly forgotten for years:—it recalled the beauty of the Fairy queen. On being awakened from this pleasant vision, I felt as if a new life had been diffused through my frame. The impression of delight and fondness was too deep to subside for many days ; and from this time it seemed as if the cloud which had lain on my spirits began to pass away.

The sound which had recalled me to common life was caused by my servant's entering to warn me that the mail would start in less than an hour. I cannot say how the connexion arose in my mind between the fascination of this dream and a reluctance to pursue my journey ; perhaps because I had fallen into that kind of delicious reverie which exertion is apt to disturb. However this may have been, I felt as if I could be happy to remain where I was, and countermanded the arrangements for my departure. On the evening of the same day a note was brought to me. It was from Mr. Everard, to the following effect :—

"I am a prisoner at home. The gout has fastened on both my feet, and I have no hope of seeing you for some weeks, unless you will favour me with your company here. It will be a great charity. I return Du Plessis Mornay. If you have the Mém. de Tavannes, pray send them as a corrective.—Yours,—

There was no concealing that the Maréchal's Memoirs had fully as much to do with this petition as any wish of Mr. Everard's to see me ; nevertheless, I was glad to have heard from him again, and called on the following day.

The appearance of his house convinced me that its owner was either a poor or a close-handed man. There was no absolute want that could be pointed out ; but the furniture and appointments were scanty and plain,—there was nothing superfluous or elegant. It was left for later acquaintance with Mr. Everard to discover which of these suppositions was the correct one, and hereby to obtain a key to some other singularities in his habits and conduct which had puzzled me frequently. He was in reality a man of sufficient means ; but a course of extravagance in early life had at one time rendered strict retrenchment necessary to repair his damaged fortune ; and he continued the habit thus acquired, after it had ceased to be a duty.

With all this I was struck, on entering his sitting room, by the discovery of an ornament that I had little expected to find there. A lady's scarf and parasol lay on a side-table. He appeared to have noticed my surprise, for in replying to my condolences and inquiries, he said :

"I fear that I am a doomed man until the winter is over. My attacks are always terribly obstinate. You see I am quite a cripple ; and have been forced to send for a nurse." While he was speaking, the door flew open, and a musical "Papa!" was followed by the entrance of a lovely girl, who came in with a bounding step, quite full of some question she had to ask or some news she had to tell. On seeing a stranger, she checked herself, blushed, and, subsiding into the elegant composure of a well-bred young lady, was about to retire quietly, when Everard asked her to remain, and presented me to his daughter Clarence.

I never saw a more beautiful creature ; she was a perfect example of the rarest charms which seem especially to belong to Englishwomen, with a radiant complexion, luxuriant brown hair, and dark blue eyes, so large that they would almost have been a defect, but for the long fringes which shaded them, and the joyous light with which they seemed absolutely to glitter and sparkle. Her person was a little above the middle height, straight and slim, but exquisitely rounded, a perfect union of softness and grace, with a neck like a swan's, looking absolutely haughty ; and, as I observed, (having a special eye to such endowments,) very small hands and feet. I was bewildered, as I gazed on all this beauty, and heard the silver tones in which the few words she spoke were uttered, by their association with something I had seen and heard before. In another instant I remembered the appearance in my dream. Yet this was by no means the same aspect. The Fairy Queen of the Salisbury ball—ahe, again, was different ; a slender, childish, shadowy creature in comparison with this. Yet I could not help being reminded of her. It was probably a mere fancy occasioned by the dream. This kind of speculation went on during the exchange of common-places that ensued on her entrance, in which she took little part, perusing me occasionally the while with glances as quick and brilliant as the rays thrown from a diamond ; and having remained no longer than courtesy might require, took the scarf and parasol, and retired. After she had closed the door, Mr. Everard, as if to account for his previous silence concerning so interesting a relation, remarked, with true parental coolness, "She will find herself terribly dull here. In general she lives with her aunt, as I do not keep house for ladies : and after Bath, this kind of seclusion will be an unwelcome change to high spirits like hers. But I hope it will not last very long." With these words he closed the subject ; but I could not follow him as readily as usual in any other : my eyes were still full of the beautiful apparition, and the tones of her voice were yet echoing in my ears. But she did not reappear : and after staying longer than I ought to have done, I willingly promised to repeat my visit, in the hopes of seeing her again. Everard's gout became worse ; and I must confess that, for the first time since our acquaintance began, I took considerable pains to amuse him. He had now acquired a totally new value in my eyes. In a short time my frequent visits to Sandown became as much a matter of course as his to my rooms had formerly been. I saw Clarence constantly, and this was nearly all. Her father was not disposed to allow any third sharer in the conversation, which he entirely directed to such matters of politics or literature as would not be likely to attract or suit a young lady. I was, moreover, become diffident ; and the more I admired her supreme beauty, the less I felt myself qualified to claim her attention. What she did occasionally contribute to the conversation was full of a spirit quite in unison with the formidable archness of her eyes ; and the sensitive lonely man became afraid of the ridicule which she seemed capable of expressing so powerfully. Yet, if she did not herself say much, she did not appear to be indifferent to the conversation ; and while I was addressing Everard consciousness of her presence gave a tone to my expressions which assuredly did not make them colder than usual. I was, however, in an uncomfortable position, eager to approach one whom I could not regard without interest, and yet unable to do so; even constrained to repress the appearance of any wish, and seemingly removed farther from its accomplishment every day. The worst consequence of such a position is, that it tends to increase daily any sense of awkwardness or embarrassment that may have existed at the outset; while it irritates the feelings by the mere power of contradiction, and makes them prone to all manner of extravagances. It certainly required no peculiar arrangement of circumstances to account for the impression which the constant presence of such a being as Clarence Everard soon made on a solitary like me, although I had thought myself past the reach of ladies' eyes. But I doubt if, in another time and place, it would have been so suddenly and deeply struck as I felt it to be before I had known her for a month. Of this I became most unpleasantly aware on every occasion when Mr. Everard named to his daughter (with needless frequency, as I thought) a certain cousin Will, who appeared to be a prominent figure in her history; and the burning of my cheek, and a restlessness that I could hardly control, told me that I was already so far gone as to be desperately jealous of a lady to whom I had scarcely spoken a dozen words, and who gave no sign of the slightest inclination to add to their number!

Towards Christmas, Everard became still worse, and the severe fits of pain to which he was subject used to exhaust him considerably. After one of these, he often fell into a deep slumber, after tea, to which my presence made no interruption; and it was during these periods that I began for the first time to converse with Clarence, in whispers, not to disturb the sleeper, as she sat netting with her eyes fixed on him.

What a fascinating creature she was when she deigned to open her lips on these occasions! An unforced liveliness gave spirit to every word she uttered, and almost made you forget that you were listening to thoughts and expressions far above the common level of a girl's discourse. She was very well informed, but everything she said was evidently unstudied and natural, and flowed from her with a most delicious naïveté, in all manner of fanciful and original combinations; so that her conversation alone, when she vouchsafed to afford it, would have rendered her absolutely charming to any one capable of following her quick wit, independently of her rare beauty. Yet with all this there was a touch of decided wilfulness that overawed me. She flew from any subject which assumed an air of seriousness with the impatience of a butterfly; and my gravity and sensitiveness seemed to afford her an amusement little flattering to my vanity. I had not long conversed with her before I was convinced of her identity with the Titania of the festival ball. The difference in person and mind was not more than an interval of nearly five years would produce in perfecting the graces of both. The wit, self-possession, and archness were too peculiar to belong to two individuals; and the tone of her voice, now grown a little fuller and softer, had nevertheless a character which I felt to be the same that had charmed me before. I refrained from satisfying myself on this point by any direct inquiry. It was evident that she had not the least idea that we had ever previously met; which was not wonderful, as I was entirely changed since then, both in appearance and manner. Nor did I at all regret this, seeing that no man, particularly if shy and depressed, would seek to be associated with ludicrous images in the mind of a woman whom he begins to adore. This was now my condition with respect to sweet, unaccountable Clarence Everard.

Great was my disgust, therefore, to find, one evening in the new year, the very cousin Will of my fears seated at her tea-table, with the bearing of a familiar guest, and addressing my tormentor unconcernedly by her Christian name, like one on the easiest possible terms both with her and with himself. He was a tall youth, not ill-looking, but to my fancy, extremely assuming and priggish, and rather dull than otherwise; with a proneness to the tedious, and a profusion of small coxcombries of speech and manner, which I should have thought Clarence must have especially contemned. To my chagrin, however, she treated him in a kind of indifferent amicable way that increased my dislike for him: without any sign of preference, indeed, while she visited his platitudes now and then with a glance or a word so keen and quick that I wondered how he bore it without shrinking. At the same time, she seemed to permit, as a matter of course, a tone of intimacy that I could not avoid envying. He was not in the least disturbed by her sallies, which either he did not feel or had learned the danger of resenting. With all this I felt myself thrown to an immeasurable distance. The brief and delightful dialogues which used to take place when Everard was sleeping were, of course, at an end; and another had stepped between me and the object of my thoughts in a way that seemed to render all nearer approach on my part impossible. Hitherto I had only felt the absence of any reason for hope; now I saw there was sufficient cause to despair of awakening any interest in her affections. Still I continued to frequent the house, although I seldom left it without a resolve to abstain in future from an intercourse which only became more mortifying to me on each repetition. But some times, when Everard would ask me to return on a particular evening, Clarence would raise her eyes for an instant, and look at me with a glance of inquiry—at least so I thought—and this was enough to secure my obedience.

I happened to be present on one occasion when she had been amusing herself by an attempt to mystify, in some way or other, cousin Will. It had been quite successful, and provoked him to say with some asperity: "I wish, Clarence, that you would cease to make a jest of every one that falls in your way: the habit will one day or other place you in some vexatious scrape: remember how barely you escaped from that silly festival business!—I thought that it might have served for a warning."

"You should have thought just the reverse," she replied, "and rather admire my extreme self-control ever since, after once yielding to such a temptation. Mr. Fanshawe shall judge," she said: and proceeded in the most gleeful and amusing manner to give me an account of my well-known Salisbury adventure, with less indulgence, of course, than appears in my own version, and with the most humorous exposure of my boyish forwardness;—adding a sequel which was new to me:—namely, that the spinster, (my ogress,) distracted between fears of robbery and hopes of a wooer, had, for weeks afterwards, prepared for the intruder's reappearance, by alternately mounting some choice piece of finery by day, and feeing a patrol to watch her door by night, until she became the town's talk. To this cousin Will, however, subjoined, first, that Clarence had actually been in Miss Vane's house at the moment of my call, and had nearly been caught by me in the sitting-room: and next, that she had indiscreetly imparted the story to some female acquaintances; and had great difficulty afterwards in concealing her share in the transaction, when by this means the trick became publicly known, to the exceeding wrath of the old maid—a relation of Everard's, and one whom he especially feared to offend, as she was rich, unmarried, and had no nearer heir than himself. It may be imagined how I relished the details of my discomfiture, seasoned with the most pungent drolery by the person of all others whom I chiefly wished to please: yet so happily were they told, that I could not avoid being really amused; and my wounded vanity was a little healed by her closing remark, which I was foolish enough to take de bonne foi, although it was evidently meant solely as a punishment for cousin Will's lecture: "After all," she said, "I have since regretted that he missed me; for, presuming as he certainly was, he was almost young and handsome enough to excuse it." Shortly afterwards my rival retired, and as it was still early, I remained at Everard's request; but in a few minutes he began to doze as usual, and I had once more an opportunity of speaking to Clarence alone. I felt an irresistible temptation (encouraged, perhaps, by her last words) to reveal myself to her as the subject of her story, and did so at once without further consideration. The discovery took her completely by surprise; she started, and gazed at me most intently for some moments, as if trying to trace in my features any recollected traits; then, blushing all over, she only exclaimed: "How you are changed, then!"—covered her face with both hands, and in spite of every effort, laughed until the tears trickled from between her rosy fingers. When this had partly subsided, she looked up again, and in a most charming way began to offer something like an apology; but the absurdity of the whole affair, and perhaps a slight degree of hysterical excitement, again overcame her, and she was interrupted at every moment by little gushes of laughter, sounding so fresh and joyous, that it was delightful to hear them, although at my own expense. At last, in spite of my mortification, the contagion became irresistible, and I echoed her so heartily, that Mr. Everard awoke. I felt infinitely obliged to her for explaining this unusual mirth to her father without betraying my secret; and I had reason to believe that she was no less generous in concealing it from cousin Will: from this time, whenever we were alone, I ventured to call her "the Fairy," which she did not absolutely prohibit. Yet I felt that I had taken a foolish step, and had placed myself more utterly at her mercy than ever; it had perhaps removed a little of the distance between us, but in a way quite the reverse of favourable to my present position. I could see, as I thought, the utterance of some ridiculous allusion hovering on her lips at every moment, and only kept back by maidenly delicacy and good breeding: and was mortified by the conviction that I had inflicted this disadvantage on myself irrevocably.

Of this every day confirmed the impression: Miss Everard became, if possible, more unapproachable, and if she favoured me by any notice at all, it was when she exercised her wit or fancy at the expense of something that I had happened to utter, and thus added to my diffidence and perplexity. This again increased the contrast between her bright spirits and triumphant beauty, and my own gloomy and sorrowful appearance; so that every day, while I more fondly admired her, I felt more thoroughly the folly of my pretensions. Mr. Everard also informed me about this time that cousin Will was destined to receive the hand of his lovely child, and hereby completed the measure of my mortification. The only way to avoid needless pain was to retire at once; and I had fully resolved to do so, when a second dream, to be described hereafter, changed my purpose, or at least weakened my resolution. It was an appearance of Clarence, so delightful, so totally unlike her real bearing towards me, and left an impression so sweet and lasting, that I could not bring myself to forego her presence which constantly recalled the charming illusion. They who are too busy to give place to anything that is not material, will laugh at this confession: but they may be assured that in certain dispositions, and under some influences of solitude or grief, visitations like this have an absolute power which is seldom dreamed of by "your philosophy."

The effect of Miss Everard's actual position, and of this brooding fancy, on the other hand, was to impart to my intercourse with her something of the far-off devotion with which a mystic regards the chosen saint of his prayers. I had ceased to entertain the slightest hope of interesting her affections: in her presence I rarely ventured to address her, and cherished in solitude the vision of a being so unlike her real self, as if this were the real object of my love, and she merely an image that recalled it. That such a prepossession rendered me still more absent and reserved than formerly, may be easily conceived; and many were the occasions which it furnished for the graceful irony with which Clarence seemed to take pleasure in disturbing me. Nevertheless, I had become gradually less impatient and dejected; it seemed as if the agitation of fruitless wishes was at an end, and I lived in a kind of visionary enjoyment, whi the sight of her kept alive. In this singular condition I hardly noticed the lapse of time, as the winter wore on, and spring began to make its appearance. With the cold weather, Mr. Everard's gout slowly retired, and as soon as he was able to walk once more, the subject of his daughter's return to her usual residence began to be named. The incursions of cousin Will had continued at intervals throughout this period; we never liked each other, and I avoided him as much as possible: my chief intercourse was now, as formerly, with Mr. Everard, but the visits to Sandown were altogether fewer. I could be happy in dreaming of Clarence when alone; but in her presence there was always a sense of pain and estrangement, which all the ease of her address (for she now began to treat me as an old but common acquaintance) could not alleviate: add to this the introduction of another party into the small household circle, whom I have not hitherto had occasion to mention—an old lady who came with the new year, ostensibly as Miss Everard's guest, but in reality to act as her chaperon,—another cause which now kept me more at a distance from her than ever.

It was, after all, late in the month of April before her father's health was sufficiently restored to allow of Clarence's departure, which was to take place on the 20th. Cousin Will had not been seen since the 1st of the month, which was signalized by his being made a most distinguished "April-fool;" his absence was probably caused by resentment of this displeasure from his lady-love. I was asked by Mr. Everard to dine on the day before she was to leave Sandown; and most reluctantly consented, knowing how much pain I must endure in this manner of leave-taking. Although I had renounced all hope of ever being nearer to her than I then was, still it was a sad prospect to lose what had been the chief occupation of my mind and feelings for many months, and know that it was never to be restored again. It was, therefore, quite natural, that on the night before this last interview, I should dream of the subject which entirely overcame me; but I could not but regard it as something strange that my dream should be an exact repetition, in every particular, of the last to which I have adverted; especially as its tenor was quite at variance with all that I had ever seen of Miss Everard's feelings and demeanour towards me. Again the influence of the dream remained almost as strong after waking as before; and although fully persuaded that it was a mere pleasant illusion, I could hardly, even at this moment, refrain from forgetting the actual departure of Clarence in the contemplation of her image so graciously presented to me during sleep.

Those who have given the reins to fancy in this manner, are rarely exact in their worldly proceedings. It has always been a matter of wonder and congratulation to me that I completed my toilette without making some flagrant omission or mistake in costume: as it was, I entirely deluded myself as to the proper time, and presented myself at Sandown, more than an hour earlier than I ought to have done. Mr. Everard had tired himself with too long a walk, and was dozing in the study;

Clarence was still in the drawing-room, as lively and tormenting as usual, but retired in a few minutes to dress. The aged lady, thank Heaven, had gone home the day before, so that I was left quite alone to my reverie, and in a few moments was as completely absorbed in the dream which haunted me, as though I had in reality been once more asleep. So vivid and soothing was its remembrance, that I quite forgot where I was, and sat gazing on vacancy in a kind of pleasant trance: even the entrance of Clarence, when she returned, did not break the illusion, but merely strengthened it, by being at once interwoven with the tissue of the dream. I must certainly have made a very singular appearance; for I neither rose nor spoke when she came in, but remained eyeing her with the utmost intentness, shading my forehead with both hands, and breathing quick, like one in a fever. No wonder that she was surprised at so unusual an exhibition! After observing it for a while, she at length dissolved the spell by asking:

"What has happened? Are you ill, or bewitched, Mr. Fanshawe? Pray, do not frighten me by looking as if a ghost was in the room!"

I started at her voice; but for an instant was still too much confused to reply sensibly. The first sensation I had felt was of anger at being interrupted in so delicious a reverie; and forgetting what she had said, I replied, with some pettishness, I believe,—

"Who is there!—oh! Miss Everard!—pardon me, I was dreaming, I am afraid,—yes, dreaming,—and so delightfully, that I am almost sorry that you awakened me!"

"You are always delightfully courteous, and quite happy in your selection of time and place for such enjoyments,—and to-day more so than ever." Saying this, she rose with an offended air, and added: "Pray, try to recover your dream: I am going away."

"Nay," I said, with a most unusual degree of courage, "I cannot recall it if you go, nor ever dream pleasantly again if you are angered, Fairy."

She looked infinitely amazed at this address, but said, "I do not understand a word of all this;—surely it is some prose or May game; if so, let me have the key, that I may take a part in it with discretion before the others come down."

"It is no such thing," I said; "but a dream, as I said, infinitely more delightful to me than any reality." As I gazed upon her, she appeared for a moment curious or irresolute, and I felt as if I must at all hazards tell her the purport of my dream.

"I cannot guess riddles," she answered; "and I have at this moment no patience to spare; but I think you can only persuade me to forget how very rude you are, by telling me something really worth such a price."

"Do not bid me," was my reply, "unless you will hear it patiently out—this, I think, would at least gain me a pardon,—yet, perhaps, you would not believe me, for it was of yourself that I dreamed."

"Of me!" she exclaimed, with a doubtful look. "Now, I must insist on hearing it. You are not permitted to take such excursions in my very presence, and then choose whether you will tell me or not."

"Are you really in earnest, Fairy?" I asked, looking at her earnestly; "for I am often at a loss to know how your pleasure is to be understood."

"Quite in earnest," she said, quickly.

"Then, if you will allow me to sit at your feet, I will tell you how I dreamed."

She nodded, laughing, and I used the permission; while, resting her arm on the corner of the sofa, and shading her eyes with one hand, she listened as I related it with an intrepidity that I can only explain by the conviction that I was still less than half awakened from my reverie, and was in a kind of excitement which put my usual diffidence to flight:

"I dreamed that I was standing at your side: where, I know not; but it was in a beautiful and flowery place, the air of which seemed to make everything that breathed in it tranquil and loving. We spoke together, not as in real life, but with seriousness and entire trust on both sides; and it was as if all fear of your charming wilfulness had left me, or that you had ceased to take pleasure in it. Then you began to tell me of something that grieved you; and at first I fancied that you were jesting, as of old: but when I looked into your eyes, they were changed. You were no longer the same Fairy at all: there were the same features, as beautiful as ever; but the expression was calm, almost mournful, and your eyes were like the centre of a heaven where all is deep and still. There now came over me an unutterable longing to shelter you from some wrong or misfortune which I seemed to fear was approaching you; and just as I turned to speak to you, an eagle with golden beak and claws darted through the branches overhead, and flew upon you. Before I could raise my hand, you cried, and I saw that he had struck your brow with his beak, and made it bleed. Again the bird attacked you; but I drove him away. Then you became very pale and faint, so that you rested your head for support on my shoulder; and I did not tell you how willingly I would have shed all the blood in my heart to restore the drops that you had lost: for in my dream (I said how much sweeter it was than the reality!) I felt that you knew how entirely I loved you; but I only took your hand, and pressed it very softly; and I saw that you understood my heart: for you looked up towards me with an eye that said all this and more; and I felt your own fingers"—"For God's sake," I said, as at the moment my story was abruptly broken off, "do not mock me, Fairy! I only said it was a dream."

I had unconsciously touched her hand at this passage; and I cannot describe the thrill which ran through my frame, the wonder and breathless suspense that moved me, as she gave me one look like that angel's glance in my dream, and her fingers slightly returned the pressure of mine.

"Am I dreaming now?" I cried. "O say that it is not so!"

She whispered "No;" and as I looked up in her face, in an ecstasy of surprise and delight, she blushed crimson red, and hid it on my shoulder. I rose, and gently drew her to my bosom. It was as if I had been struck by lightning! The suddenness of an event, so wholly unexpected, completely paralyzed me. I continued gazing upon the sweet burden, with my heart too full for speech. I could not even shed a tear, hardly draw breath, nor did I venture to disturb a scene that seemed like some unsubstantial rapture, which a touch would again resolve into air.

After some moments, she softly freed herself from my embrace, and, looking up with all her wonted radiance of eye, although it now swam in tears, she said to me, "You have been too hard with me. I will hear no more of your dream;" and again raised her hands to her brow, on which I impressed my first kiss, as I replied, "There is no more, sweetest Clarence! You have made me too happy in waking—I forget the rest."

"I am afraid I have been very foolish, and you too headstrong," she said, after a longer silence; "but this is now past; and what shall I"—The remainder of her speech was cut short by an apparition, which we had both been too blissfully engaged in looking at each other to observe before. It was no other than cousin Will himself! who could not, indeed, have been expected to look less spiteful and blank than he did, seeing his mistress in the arms of another. Clarence, thus caught, seemed for the first time afraid of him, and ran out of the room with a little scream, nearly oversetting her father, who was at the same moment tottering in at the door. But he did not, after all, escape without mischief; for cousin Will, who was addressing me in a very angry manner, happened to stamp violently at the instant when Everard had reached him, and damaged his tender foot so effectually that his suffering, and the necessary call for relief, caused a diversion, by which I profited to recover a little sang froid, and prepare myself for the result of this most unhopd for happiness. The first thing was, of course, to give my rival a clear intimation that I was prepared to do battle to the uttermost for Clarence; and it was gratifying to see that his distinct perception of this fact, while it surprised him, in one whom he had always regarded as a shy, inconsiderable person, acted as a wonderful emollient of his anger. This took place while Everard was undergoing the process of fomenting and wrapping up the wounded member. It then fell to his turn to demand explanations of what had happened; and I found his displeasure by no means so easily checked as cousin Will's had been. To acquaint him with the real history of the declaration, and its success, which seemed quite as surprising to me as it could be to him, would, of course, have been useless; he would have thought I was jesting with him. I therefore merely said that the prospect of his daughter's departure had wrung from me an involuntary avowal of feelings that I had long borne in secret, and that, to my infinite wonder and delight, I found them reciprocated; having, until that moment, never entertained the shadow of such a presumption. This it was naturally by no means easy to make Everard believe; and he turned, without replying, to cousin

Will, whose opinion on the matter he requested to hear. I was really sorry for the conflict which I could see was passing in my rival's mind, between the desire of revenge, and the apprehension of its consequences. Fear, however, prevailed; and he declared, with as much indifference as he could assume, that, after such a proof as he had witnessed of his cousin's partiality for another, it was impossible for him to continue a suit, which she had, as he complained, never given him any reason to consider acceptable to her. This was even less satisfactory to Mr. Everard than my discourse had been, and he sent to desire the presence of his daughter. She refused, however, to appear except to Everard alone. What passed between them I learned afterwards from her own confession to me; and it may be conceived with what pride and delight I heard, that this coy, brilliant creature, had long pitied and loved in secret the melancholy being, whose story had sunk deep into her heart, when I little thought she was listening to it. She admitted that, but for the accidental discovery of this morning, she might scarcely have known how strongly the feeling had rooted itself there; but also affirmed that in no case she had ever liked, or would have bestowed herself upon her cousin.

Such was the perplexed web which I had to attempt to disentangle; a change so sudden and remarkable in the relations of all the parties, which had been brought about by the occurrence of my dream alone. I have dwelt so long on the main incident, that it will be as well to reserve for a following chapter the detail of the obstacles and anxieties which were to be encountered before I could fully obtain the precious gift which Clarence Everard had bestowed upon me. It is sufficient to say, that I at length triumphed over her father's reluctance and economic scruples; and that all the happiness I have since enjoyed has been the dower of her bright spirit and affectionate heart. It would possibly amuse some of my readers to hear that, in the final accomplishment of our mutual wishes, the interference of the same Miss Vane, who appears in the early part of this episode, was most whimsically effective. She never was informed of my identity with the intruder of former years, and has taken a great liking to my eldest son, who, I believe, will one day be her heir; but Clarence still threatens to betray my secret, whenever I venture to disobey any of her behests; although, as it has now been kept for twelve years, I think little of the menace.

With such daily reasons to rejoice in my singular good fortune, the cardinal point of which has been shown truly, and without a word of embellishment, it will seem not unnatural that I should think reverentially of dreams, and believe, with the old poet, that "they are sent from Heaven." I may have occasion hereafter to furnish additional reasons for this faith, of a nature more striking, if less agreeable, than the preceding narrative displays. In the meantime I will only express a hearty wish that the gracious and gay, whom I especially addressed at the beginning of the story, may dream, whenever it may be most welcome and surprising to them, as sweetly and truly as I have done, of the being that lies nearest to their hearts!

V.

AMENITIES OF LITERATURE.*

It would not be easy to estimate the beneficial effects of the writings of Mr. D'Israeli, not alone in the secondary respect of diffusing knowledge of the history of letters, but in creating and fostering a taste for the enjoyments of varied literature among hundreds of thousands who, save for his fascinating pages, would, as soon as the young appetite for fiction was blunted, for ever have closed their books,—among those who would have been repelled by mere learning, however profound or accurate, and who have been won by the grace and amenity with which the most recondite subjects have been brought forward in his works, and rendered "as amusing as a fairy tale." It may be quite possible that the learning of Mr. D'Israeli is sometimes what the erudite critic and antiquary may pronounce superficial; that his statements are occasionally inaccurate, and that, in short, he does not consider nor treat those "amenities of literature," amid which he has delighted to linger, as exact science; yet it is at least equally true, that of the greater part of the topics which he has discussed, that numerous and important division of society, the Reading Public, as distinguished from the learned and the studious, would, save for him, have known nothing, and cared nothing. His writings, it is to be remembered, preceded the Quarterlies and Retrospectives, and the whole herd of periodical publications, which have since tended to familiarize the English public with the elder and greater writers of England. He was, so to speak, the pioneer in a labyrinthine path, which has since been tracked by discoverers more remarkable for accurate and minute observation, and probably for greater boldness and sagacity; but who, save for his example, might never have set forth on such ventures, and certainly had never been followed by those troops of the curious whom he had previously attracted in that direction.

The endless and varied omnium-gatherum information which he has furnished to the student of national manners and of the vernacular literature, the delight which he has ministered, and which his writings will long continue to minister to the literary loungee, is, therefore, a smaller merit than that love of graceful and humanizing studies which his researches have excited in those who lay beyond the reach of higher motives for study. Many contemporary authors have produced higher works, but no one has done more to diffuse the taste for elegant letters, or to minister to that taste when created ; so that, if not first in Creative literature, he is among the very first in that important modern department which may be described as Administrative literature.

The present work comes before the world with tender and somewhat melancholy interest. At the close of a long life, devoted exclusively to literary pursuits, Mr. D'Israeli, surrendering a hope long and fondly cherished, lays before the world the unconnected fragments of a vast design ; and instead of a complete History of our Vernacular Literature which he had projected—of a finished and stupendous edifice—he presents many separate but highly-elaborated fragments of the intended temple ; here a disjointed pillar, there an enriched entablature, or a classical frieze, together with a mass of the humbler material which was to give the whole parts coherence, strength, and form. To pursue our figure, there is also, of necessity, a certain quantity of superincumbent or surrounding rubbish. But the author may best tell his own touching story :—

A history of our vernacular literature has occupied my studies for many years. It was my design not to furnish an arid narrative of books or of authors, but following the steps of the human mind through the wide track of Time, to trace, from their beginnings, the rise, the progress, and the decline of public opinions, and to illustrate, as the objects presented themselves, the great incidents in our national annals.

In the midst of my studies I was arrested by the loss of sight ; the papers in this collection are a portion of my projected history.

There is one more remark in which I must indulge : the author of the present work is denied the satisfaction of reading a single line of it, yet he flatters himself that he shall not trespass on the indulgence he claims for any slight inadvertences. It has been confided to one whose eyes unceasingly pursue the volume for him who can no more read, and whose eager hand traces the thought ere it vanish in the thinking ; but it is only a father who can conceive the affectionate patience of filial devotion.

In this manner has this probably final work of one who has contributed to the most refined enjoyments of life, during two generations of men, been ushered into the world. There are in that world some few unhappy, critical persons, so exquisitely learned, so wise, far above what Mr. D'Israeli or any one else has written or may write, as to render it impossible either to instruct or amuse them ; but there is a much more numerous circle who will gratefully prize the varied and erudite knowledge, the genial criticism, and suggestive speculation, which their old favourite has conveyed, in a form which, if not faultlessly perfect, is always winning and agreeable ; which is full, in short, of the grace and amenity which gives zest to liberal studies.

The work opens with an account of the Druids, and the Druidical Institution in Britain, at that period when fabulous history gives place to wavering tradition, and is succeeded by records gradually becoming more and more worthy of credit. After adverting to the antiquarian romances, or "old Almanacks," which pretend to give an account of the first inhabitants of the British Isles, he comes to the people as they are first beheld in authentic history.

Whoever might be the first-comers to this solitary island, when we obtain any knowledge of the inhabitants, we are struck by their close resemblance to those tribes of savage life whom our navigators have discovered, and who are now found in almost a primitive state among that innumerable cluster of what has recently been designated the Polynesian Isles. The Aborigines of Britain took the same modes of existence and fell into similar customs. We discover their rude population divided into jealous tribes, in perpetual battle with one another ; they lived in what Hobbes has called the status belli, with no notion of the mos and the tuum ; in the same community of their women as was found in Otaheite ; and with the same ignorance of property, when its representative in some form was not yet invented. Our aborigines resembled these races even in their personal appearance ; a Polynesian chief has been drawn and coloured after the life, and the figure exhibits the perfect picture of an ancient Briton, almost naked, the body painted red ; the British savage chose blue, and made deep incisions in the flesh to insert his indelible woad. The fierce eye, and the bearded lip, with the long hair scattered to the waist, exhibit the Briton as he was seen by Cæsar, and, a century afterwards, as the British monarch Caractacus appeared before the emperor Claudius at Rome : his sole ornaments consisted of an iron collar, and an iron girdle ; but as his naked majesty had his skin painted with figures of animals, however rudely, this was probably a distinctive dress of British royalty. These Britons lived in thick woods, herding among circular huts of reed, as we find other tribes in this early state of society ; and submissive to the absolute dominion of a priesthood of magicians, as we find even among the Esquimaux ; and performing sanguinary rites similar to those of the ancient Mexicans ; we are struck with the conviction that men in a parallel condition remain but uniform beings.

Yet the instructors, the intellectual guides, of these savage tribes, these primitive Socialists, were the far-famed Druids ; whose history has long afforded such a savoury bone for picking, or one on which to break the teeth of learned antiquaries. As in speaking of the aborigines of the country, our author, after briefly stating the conjectures and conflicting theories of the learned, takes up the original priests and lawgivers of Britain where the first authentic traces of their singular order may be found. The passage will be curious to many, and it affords a fair, and not an unfavourable specimen of the general level style of the book :—

Whence and when the British Druids transplanted themselves to this lone world amid the ocean, bringing with them all the wisdom of far-antiquity, to an uncivilized race, is one of those events in the history of man which no historian can write. It is evident that they long preserved what they had brought ; since the Druids of Gaul were fain to resort to the Druids of Britain to renovate their instruction.

The Druids have left no record of themselves ; they seem to have disdained an immortality separate from the existence of their order ; but the shadow of their glory is reflected for ever in the verse of Lucretius, and the prose of Cæsar. The poet imagined that if the knowledge of the gods was known to man, it had been alone revealed to these Priests of Britain. The narrative of the historian is comprehensive, but, with all the philosophical cast of his mind and the intensity of his curiosity, Cæsar was not a Druid ; and only a Druid could have written—had he dared!—on DRUIDICACHT—a sacred, unspeakable word at which the people trembled in their veneration.

The British Druids constituted a sacred and a secret society, religious, political, and literary. In the rude mechanism of society in a state of pupillage, the first elements of government, however gross, or even puerile, were the levers to lift and to sustain the unheaven masses of the barbaric mind. Invested with all privileges and immunities, amid that transient omnipotence which man in his first feeble condition can confer, the wild children of society crouched together before those illusions which superstition so easily forges; but the supernatural dominion lay in the secret thoughts of the people; the marauder had not the daring to touch the open treasure as it lay in the consecrated grove; and a single word from a Druid for ever withered a human being "cut down like grass." The loyalty of the land was a religion of wonder and fear, and to dispute with a Druid was a state-crime.

They were a secret society, for whatever was taught was forbidden to be written; and not only their doctrines and their sciences were veiled in this sacred obscurity, but the laws which governed the community were also oral. For the people, the laws probably were impartially administered; for the Druids were not the people, and without their sympathies, these judges at least sided with no party. But if these sages, amid the conflicting interests of the multitude, seemed placed above the vicissitudes of humanity, their own more solitary passions were the stronger, violently compressed within a higher sphere; ambition, envy, and revenge, those curses of nobler minds, often broke their dreams. The election of an Arch-Druid was sometimes to be decided by a battle. Some have been chronicled by a surname which indicates a criminal. No king could act without a Druid by his side, for peace or war were on his lips; and whenever the order made common cause, woe to the kingdom! It was a terrible hierarchy. The golden knife which pruned the mistletoe beneath the mystic oak, immolated the human victim.

The Druids were the common fathers of the British youth, for they were the sole educators; but the genius of the order admitted of no inept member. For the Acolyte unendowed with the faculty of study all initiation ceased; nature herself had refused this youth the glory of Druidism; but he was taught the love of his country. The Druidical lyre kindled patriotism through the land, and the land was saved—for the Druids!

The Druidical custom of unwritten instruction was ingeniously suggested by Cicero as designed to prevent their secret doctrines from being divulged to those unworthy or ill-fitted to receive them, and to strengthen the memory of their votaries by its continued exercise; but we may suspect, that this barbarous custom of this most ancient sodality began at a period when they themselves neither read nor wrote, destitute of an alphabet of their own; for when the Druids had learned from the Greeks their characters, they adopted them in all their public and private affairs. We learn that the Druidical sciences were contained in twenty thousand verses, which were to prompt their perpetual memory. Such traditional science could not be very progressive; what was to be got by rote no disciple would care to consider obsolete, and a century might elapse without furnishing an additional couplet. The Druids, like some other institutions of antiquity, by not perpetuating their doctrines, or their secrets, in this primeval state of theology and philosophy, by writing, have effectually concealed their own puerile simplicity. But the monuments of a people remain to perpetuate their character. We may judge of the genius or state of the Druidical arts and sciences by such objects. We are told that the Druids were so wholly devoted to nature that they prohibited the use of any tool in the construction of their rude works; all are unhewn masses, or heaps of stones; such are their cairns and cromlechs and corneddes, and that wild architecture whose stones hang on one another, still frowning on the plains of Salisbury. A circle of stones marked the consecrated limits of the Druidical Tribunal; and in the midst a hillock heaped up for the occasion was the judgment-seat. Here, in the open air, in "the eye of light and the face of the sun," to use the Bardic style, the decrees were pronounced, and the Druids harangued the people. Such a scene was exhibited by the Hebrew Patriarchs, from whom some imagine these Druids descended; but whether or not the Celtic be of this origin we must not decide by any analogous manners or customs, because these are nearly similar wherever we trace a primitive race—so uniform is nature, till art, infinitely various, conceals nature herself.

The disciples of the Druids, who were in a condition not dissimilar to that of the New Zealanders just invaded by the English, gradually disappeared before the Saxons, the descendants and followers of Woden; and Brithon, or the land of the stained or painted men, became "Saxony beyond the sea," and finally, by one of those capricious accidents which rule names, Engle-land. In giving a sketch of the Anglo-Saxon period, Mr. D'Israeli pays due respect to SHARON TURNER. He gives this brief summary of the character of Anglo-Saxon literature:—

Prescribed formulae, and such a mechanism of verse, must have tethered the imagination in a perpetual circle; it was art which violated the free course of nature. In this condition we often find even the poetry of the Scandinavians. The famous death-song of Regner Lodbrog seems little more than an iteration of the same ideas. An Anglo-Saxon poem has the appearance of a collection of short hints rather than poetical conceptions, curt and ejaculative; a paucity of objects yields but a paucity of emotions, too vague for detail, too abrupt for deep passion, too poor in fancy to scatter the imagery of poesy. The Anglo-Saxon betrays its confined and monotonous genius; we are in the first age of art, when pictures are but monochromes of a single colour. Hence, in the whole map of Anglo-Saxon poetry, it is difficult to discriminate one writer from another.

Their prose has taken a more natural character than their verse. The writings of Alfred are a model of the Anglo-Saxon style in its purest state—they have never been collected, but it is said they would form three or four volumes; they consist chiefly of translations.

Some learned and critical pains are bestowed upon the imagined prototype of Milton, the apocryphal Cædmon the Saxon, whom his admirers hail as "the Father of English song." Remarkable as is the resemblance between the monkish poem, pretended to have been the production of an inspired peasant, and several parts of Paradise Lost, Mr. D'Israeli, though as prone on other occasions to hunt out coincidences as his neighbours, does not believe that Milton could know anything of this singular Saxon poem, nor even of the language in which it was veiled. Yet the similarity in incidents, characters, and the very expressions, is so remarkable, that if Milton had really no knowledge of Cædmon, critics ought to be doubly cautious in their allegations of plagiarism.

Mr. D'Israeli has illustrated the heroic period—the "Hero-life" of the Saxons—in giving an analytical account of the ancient Anglo-Saxon metrical romance of Beowulf. Its history is among the literary curiosities of this work.

Mr. D'Israeli then reaches a period of our literary history which is much better known; the Anglo-Norman age, of which he takes a rapid and animated survey. Conservative as are his views of political society, his prepossessions are not exclusively Norman. The designs of the Conqueror, like those of every other successful military leader, were not formed all at once, but were developed by time and chance. After the battle of Hastings, and the apparent settlement of the kingdom, William withdrew for nine months to his Duchy, leaving his warlike followers in England, to maintain themselves against the Saxons. He then returned; and thus rapidly is traced the consummation of his plans, and of Saxon degradation.

One night in December the king suddenly appeared in England, and soon unlimited confiscations and royal grants apportioned the land of the Saxons among the lords of Normandy, and even their lance-bearers. It seemed as if every new-comer brought his castles with him, so rapidly did castles cover the soil. These were strongholds for the tyrant foreigner, or open retreats for his predatory bands; stern overlookers were they of the land!

The Norman lords had courts of their own; sworn vassals to their suzerain, but kinglings to the people. Sometimes they beheld a Saxon lord, whose heart could not tear itself from the lands of his race, a serf on his own soil; but they witnessed without remorse the rights of the sword. Norman prelates were silently substituted for Saxon ecclesiastics, and whole companies of claimants arrived to steal into benefices or rush into abbeys. It was sufficient to be a foreigner and land in England, to become a bishop or an abbot. Church and State were now indissolubly joined, for in the general plunder each took their orderly rank.

The Emperor of Russia, in his treatment of the Poles, seems to have taken "the Conqueror" as his model, especially in the attempted annihilation of the national language. But there are things which are beyond the power of the most determined tyrant. Though many of the Saxons, eager to pay court to their Norman lords, assumed the Norman costume, and tried to forget their own language, which, by a caprice worthy of a tyrant, William proscribed, because, after making the attempt, he was unable to acquire it; yet it is finely said—

Not at his bidding could the military chief for ever silence the mother-tongue. Enough for "this stern man" to guard the land in peace, while every single hyde of land in England was known to him and "put at its worth in his book," as records the Saxon chronicler. The language of a people is not to be conquered as the people themselves. "The birth-tongue" may be imprisoned or banished, but it cannot die—the people think in it; the images of their thoughts, their traditional phrases, the carol over the mead-cup, and their customs far diffused, survived even the iron tongue of the curfew.

The Saxons themselves, who had chased the native Britons from their land, still found that they could not suppress the language of the fugitive people. The conquerors gave their Anglo-Saxon denominations to the towns and villages they built; but the hills, the forests, and the rivers retain their old Celtic names. Nature and nationality will outlast the transient policy of a new dynasty.

Yet so completely was the national language at one period forgotten by the upper classes, that—

Not one of our monarchs and statesmen could understand the most ordinary words in the national tongue. When Henry the Second was in Pembrokeshire, and was addressed in English—"Goode olde Kynge," the King of England inquired in French of his esquire what was meant! Of the title of "Kynge," we are told that his majesty was wholly ignorant! A ludicrous anecdote of the chancellor of Richard the First is a strange evidence that the English language was wholly a foreign one for the English court. This chancellor in his flight from Canterbury, disguised as a female hawk, carrying under his arm a bundle of cloth, and an ell-measure in his hand, sate by the sea-side waiting for a vessel. The fishermen's wives inquired the price of the cloth, he could only answer by a burst of laughter; for this man, born in England, and chancellor of England, did not know a single word of English!

For centuries the writers, generally poets patronized by the court, composed in the only language known at the court; yet the national spirit was not wholly extinguished even among the Anglo-Norman poets; who, as is complained by a French writer, for their heroes, preferred "a fabulous Arthur to a true Charlemagne, and English knights to French paladins."

M. Guizot was enabled by the French government to indulge his literary patriotism, by sending a skilful collector to England to search in our libraries for Norman writings; and we are told, that none but Anglo-Norman writers have been found, that is, Englishmen writing on English affairs, and so English that they have not always avoided an unguarded expression of their dislike of foreigners, and even of Normans!

It is worthy of observation, that even those Norman writers who came young into England soon took the colour of the soil, and what rather surprises us, considering the fashion of the court of that period, studied the original national language, translated our Saxon writings, and often mingled in their French verse phrases and terms which to this day we recognise as English.

But if the Anglo-Norman poets, though writing only in the language understood by their patrons, royal or noble, were still under the natural influence of national feelings, there was another literary class, who, with warm patriotic sympathies and remembrances, retained also their love and knowledge of the "birth-tongue."

The monks, who lived rusticated in their scattered monasteries, sojourners in the midst of their conquered land, often felt their Saxon blood tingle in their veins. Not only did the filial love of their country deepen their sympathies, but a more personal indignation rankled in their secret bosoms, at the foreign intruders, French or Italian,—the tyrannical bishop and the voluptuous abbot. There were indeed monks, and some have been our chroniclers, base-born, humiliated, and living in fear, who in their leiger-books, when they alluded to their new masters, called them "the conquerors," noticed the year when some "conqueror" came in, and recorded what "the conquerors" had enacted. All these "conquerors" designated the foreigners, who were the heads of their houses. But there were other truer Saxons. Inspired equally by their public and their private feeling, these were the first who, throwing aside both Latin and French, addressed the people in the only language intelligible to them. The patriotic monks decided that the people should be reminded that they were Saxons, and they continued their history in their own language.

This precious relic has come down to us—THE SAXON CHRONICLE; but which in fact is a collection of chronicles made by different persons. These Saxon annalists had been eye-witnesses of the transactions they recorded; and this singular detail of incidents, as they occurred, without comment, is a phenomenon in the history of mankind, like that of the history of the Jews contained in the Old Testament, and, like that, as its learned editor has ably observed, "a regular and chronological panorama of a people described in rapid succession by different writers, through many ages, in their own VERNACULAR LANGUAGE." The mutations in the language of this ancient chronicle are as remarkable as the fortunes of the nation in its progress from rudeness to refinement; nor less observable are the entries in this great political register from the year one, of Christ, till 1154, when it abruptly terminates. The meagreness of the earlier recorders contrasts with the more impressive detail of later enlarged and thoughtful minds. When we come to William of Normandy, we have a character of that monarch by one who knew him personally, having lived at his court. It is not only a masterly delineation, but a skilful and steady dissection. The earlier Saxon chronicler has recorded a defeat and retreat which Cæsar suffered in his first invasion, which would be difficult to discover in the commentaries of Cæsar.

The true language of the people lingered on their lips, and it seemed to bestow a shadowy independence to a population in bondage. The remoter the locality, the more obdurate was the Saxon; and these indwellers were latterly distinguished as "Uplandish" by the inhabitants of cities. For about two centuries "the Uplandish" held no social connexion; separated not only by distance, but by their isolated dialects and peculiar customs, these natives of the soil shrank into themselves, intermarrying and dying on the same spot; they were hardly aware that they were without a country.

We now possess two translations of the SAXON CHRONICLE; the first made, and privately printed by Miss Gurney, in 1810; the second by the Rev. Dr. Ingram of Oxford, in 1823.—In a subsequent part of the work, Mr. D'Israeli discusses the origin of the English language, and its vicissitudes and dialects, shaking himself free of the manacles of the purists, and of the systematic critics.—Retaining for the venerable mother-tongue a devotion which does not degenerate into blind idolatry, he pertinently closes the subject by inquiring—

Are we to banish to perpetuity those foreigners who have already fructified our Saxon soil? In an age of extended literature, conversant with objects and productive of associations which never entered into the experience of our forefathers, the ancient language of the people must necessarily prove inadequate; a new language must start out of new conceptions. Look into our present "exchequer of words;" there lies many a refined coinage struck out of the arts and the philosophies of Europe. Every word which genius creates, and which time shall consecrate, is a possession of the language which must be inscribed into that variable doomsday book of words—the English Dictionary. Devotees of Thor and Woden! the day of your idolatries has passed, and your remonstrances are vain as your superstitions.

It happens with the destiny of words, as in the destiny of empires. Men in their own days see only the beginnings of things, and more sensibly feel the inconvenience of that state of transition inflicted by innovation, in its first approaches often capricious, always empirical. These vicissitudes of language in their end were to produce a vernacular idiom more wealthy than our native indigence seemed to promise. All those vehement cries of the critics which we have brought together were but the sharp pangs and throes of a parturient language in the natural progress of a long-protracted birth.

A national idiom in its mighty formation, struggling into its perfect existence, encumbered by the heavy mass in which it lies involved, resembles the creation of the lion of the Bard of Paradise, when

HIS HINDER PARTS.

Though the language has long been settled, so far as dictionaries can settle any language, the different dialects of England might, up to this hour, lead a foreigner to infer that the people are distinct races. At the close of the fourteenth century, the inhabitants of different parts of the island, we are told, could hardly understand each other; but, according to our author—according, indeed, to well-known fact—

Even to this day, a scene almost similar might be exhibited. Should a peasant of the Yorkshire dales, and one from the vales of Taunton, and another from the hills of the Chiltern, meet together, they would require an interpreter to become intelligible to each other; but in this dilemma what county could produce the English man so versed in provincial dialects as to assist his three honest countrymen!

The Romance of "Octavian Imperator," which was written possibly earlier than the reign of Henry VI., is in the Hampshire dialect nearly as it is spoken now. The speech of a Yorkshireman is energetically described by our ancient Trivisa. "It is so sharpe, alytting, frotyng, and unshape, that we sothern men maye unmeth understand that language." As we advance in the North, the tones of the people are described as "round and sonorous, broad open vowels, and the richness and fullness of the diphthongs fill their mouths" with a firm, hardy speech.

A striking contrast is observable among those who by their secluded position have held little intercourse with their neighbours, and have contracted an overweening estimation of themselves, and a provincial pride in their customs, manners, and language. Norfolk, surrounded on three sides by the sea, remains unaltered to this day, and still designates as "Shiremen" all who are born out of Norfolk, not without "some little expression of contempt." There is "a narrowness and tenuity in their pronunciation," such as we may fancy—for it is but a fancy—would steal out of the lips of reserved, proud men, and who, as their neighbours of Suffolk run their common talk into strange melancholy cadences, have characterized their peculiar intonation as "the Suffolk whine!" In Derbyshire the pronunciation is broad, and they change the e into æ. The Lancashire folk speak quick and curt, omit letters, or sound three or four words all together; thus, I wou'didd'n or I woudyedd'd, is a cacophony which stands for I wish you would. When the editor of a Devonshire dialect found that it was aspersed as the most uncouth jargon in England, he appealed to the Lancashire.

But it is among our provincial dialects that we discover many beautiful archaisms, scattered remnants of our language, which explain those obscurities of our more ancient writers, singularities of phrase, or lingual peculiarities, which have so often bewildered the most acute of our commentators. After all their voluminous research and their conjectural temerity, a villager in Devonshire or in Suffolk, and, more than either, the remoter native of the North Countree, with their common speech, might have recovered the baffled commentators from their agony.

So discursive or desultory is this fragmentary work, that from these learned dissertations on the vernacular tongue, we jump to a chapter on Mandeville, the first traveller of a nation distinguished beyond all others for the enterprise of its discoverers and travellers. We like our author the better for his strong faith in the truth of that marvellous dealer in marvels, who himself fully believed the wonders he related; and who, yielding himself to imposture and to the simply marvellous, with harmless credulity, yet intended no imposition; or, at worst, used the saving clause to his narratives of "men seyn," as children conclude their nursery stories with, "and if all tales be true this is no lie." If the veracity of Mandeville is not made out by Mr. D'Israeli, to the entire satisfaction of the stickler for rigid statements made "on soul and conscience," his apology may satisfy the good-natured, and perhaps the philosophic reader; while all must agree that our first traveller was a brave as well as a gallant man.

At a period when Europe could hardly boast of three leisurely wayfarers stealing over the face of the universe; when the Orient still remained but a Land of Fairy, and "the map of the world" was yet unfinished; at a time when it required a whole life to traverse a space which three years might now terminate, Sir JOHN MANDEVILLE set forth to enter unheard-of regions. Returning home, after an absence of more than thirty years, he discovered a "mervayle" strange as those which he loved to record—that he was utterly forgotten by his friends!

His travels were originally written in Latin, and translated into French, and from that patent tongue into English, "that," as he said, "every man of my nation may understand it."

Copies of these travels were multiplied till they almost equalled in number those of the Scriptures; now we may smile at the "mervayles" of the fourteenth century, and of Mandeville, but it was the spirit of these intrepid and credulous minds which has marched us through the universe. To these children of imagination perhaps we owe the circumnavigation of the globe and the universal intercourse of nations.

Chaucer, Gower, Lydgate, Occleve, the mysterious author of the Visions of Piers Ploughman, form, in Mr. D'Israeli's page, so many successive bright links in the broken chain of our literary history.

In a democratic age one feels a natural curiosity about the first democratic English writer, who was a poet, because he courted obscurity, and because all writers who were not chroniclers then wrote in metre. Piers Ploughman's Visions have long exercised the ingenuity of the critics. Mr. D'Israeli's speculations, though not differing materially from those of Campbell, Gray, and others, are more condensed; and he perceives deeper meanings hidden in the allegory of the Ploughman than most of the previous antiquarian critics. He remarks:

The pearls in these waters lie not on the surface. The visionist had deeper thoughts and more concealed feelings than these rhapsodical phantoms. In a general survey of society, he contemplates on the court and the clergy, glancing through all the diversified ranks of the laity, not sparing the people themselves, as their awful reprobator. It was a voice from the wilderness in the language of the people. The children of want and oppression had found their solitary advocate. The prelate, dissolved in the luxuriousness of papal pomp, and a barbarous aristocracy, with their rapacious dependents, were mindless of the morals or the happiness of those human herds, whose heads were counted, but whose hearts they could never call their own.

We are curious to learn, in this disordered state of the commonwealth, the political opinions entertained by this sage. They are as mysterious as Piers Ploughman himself.

Our author's indignant spirit, indeed, is vehemently democratic. He dared to write what many trembled to whisper. Genius reflects the suppressed feelings of its age. It was a stirring epoch. The spirit of inquisition had gone forth in the person of Wickliffe; and wherever a Wickliffe appears, as surely will there be a Piers Ploughman. When a great precursor of novel opinions arises, it is the men of genius in seclusion who think and write.

But our country priest, in his contemplative mood, was not less remarkable for his prudence than for his bold freedom, aware that the most corrupt would be the most vindictive. The implacable ecclesiastics, by the dread discipline of the church, would doom the apostle of humanity, but the apostate of his order, to perpetual silence—by the spell of an anathema; and the haughty noble would crush his victim by the iron arm of his own, or of the civil power. The day had not yet arrived when the great were to endure the freedom of reprehension. The sage, the satirist, and the seer, for prophet he proved to be, veiled his head in allegory; he published no other names than those of the virtues and the vices; and to avoid personality, he contented himself with personification.

The author of Piers Ploughman—who was the contemporary of Gower and Chaucer, and who is supposed to have been Robert Langland, a secular priest of Salop—wrote in pure Anglo-Saxon. Two centuries after his appearance, at the era of the Reformation, the people were startled by the discovery of an unknown writer, who, before the invention of printing, had predicted the fate of the religious houses from the hand of a king. "The deep foresight of an obscure country priest, which required two centuries to be verified, became a great moral and political prediction." Our author gives the Visions of Piers Ploughman new praise when he says:

The "VISIONS OF PIERS PLOUGHMAN" will always offer studies for the poetical artist. This volume, and not Gower's nor Chaucer's, is a well of English undefiled.

Mr. D'Israeli imagines that these Visions may have given Bunyan the idea of the Pilgrim's Progress; but it was surely more unlikely that the unlettered tinker of Bedford could ever have heard of this obscure ancient writer than that Milton had perused Cædmon. Yet the fact is not impossible. During the ferment of the Reformation, Robert Crowley, a man of singular character, the Cobbett or De Foe of his age, disinterred and printed the Visions of the Ploughman, and stray copies may have travelled into the country, and remained until the time of Bunyan. Robert Crowley was himself one of the Curiosities of Literature, and probably a full sharer in the Calamities of Authors. Crowley was a Man of the Time; a "universal reformer in Church and State." He had been a student of Magdalene College, Oxford, and had obtained a fellowship; but about the close of the reign of Henry the Eighth, he became an inhabitant of London; and, in the reign of Edward the Sixth, we find him a printer and bookseller. Mr. D'Israeli not without probability concludes that, in the changes and confiscations of the period, he had lost his fellowship. He was distinguished as a controversial writer, and a poetical satirist. He was also a preacher; and is described by a contemporary as "an earnest professor of religion." He appears to have entertained Spencean or radical opinions; and to have participated strongly in those feelings which at present agitate the bosom of society, and alienate the poor from the rich. We must see more of this Crowley.

One of the most striking productions of this earnest reformer, for its freedom, was his address to the assembled parliament. The title is expressive—"An Information and Petition against the Oppressors of the Commoners of this Realm." Compiled and imprinted for this only purpose, that among them that have to do in the parliament, some godly-minded men may heretake occasion to speak more in the matter than the author was able to write." Crowley too modestly alludes to any deficiencies of his own; his "information" is ample, and doubtless conveyed to the ear of those "who had to do in the parliament," what must have startled the oldest senator.

Who are "the oppressors of the poor commoners?" All the orders in society! the clergy—the laity—and, above all, "the Possessioners!"

This term, "the Possessioners," was a popular circulating coinage struck in the mint of our reformer—probably included much more than meets our ear. Every land-owner, every proprietor, was a "Possessioneer." Whether in an orderly, primitive commonwealth there should be any "Possessioners," might be a debatable point in a parliament composed of "the poor Commons" themselves, with our Robin for their speaker. But however this might be, "the Possessioners of this realm," as he calls them, "could only be reformed by God working in their hearts, as he did in the primitive church, when the Possessioners were contented and very willing to sell their possessions and give the price thereof to be common to all the faithful believers." This seems perfectly intelligible, but our reformer judged it required some explanation—as thus: "He would not have any to take him as though he went about to make all things common." Doubtless, there were some propagators of this new revelation of a primitive Christian community, and as little doubt that Robin himself was one; for he adds, "If the Possessioners know how they ought to bestow their possessions," and he had already instructed them, in that case "he doubted not it should not need to have all things made common." Such was the logic of this primitive radical reformer. A bland compromise, and a sturdy menace.

Political economy was then almost an occult science. But though no bread-tax had been imposed for the advantage of the landlords, rents were naturally rising, and our sturdy reformer liked not that. He denounced "lease-mongers pilling and polling the poor commoner," and the unrighteous act of parliament, which legalized the interest of money, at ten per cent. His vituperations did not stop here. We find the radical preacher of the age of Edward the Sixth employing almost the same language as William Howitt, in his History of Priestcraft. He thus attacks his reverend brethren:

We can neither come into the world, nor remain in it, nor go out of it, but they must have a fleece! Let it be lawful to perform all their ministries by ourselves; we can lay an honest man in his grave without a set of carrion-crows scenting their prey.

This was an age of great license in speech; and then, as since, the promised reforms were lagging far behind the expectations of reformers.

As a specimen of our author's historical style, we shall cite the manner in which so many of Robert Crowley's "possessioners" obtained the estates which their descendants hold to this hour:—

The act which at a single blow annihilated the monastic orders and their "lands and tenements," was hailed as the most patriotic which had been ever passed by an English sovereign. It made even a tyrannous and jealous monarch, who cut off more heads of men and women than any other on record, popular and extolled even in his latter days.

Henry the Eighth had paused at the blow he was about to level. The plunder was too monstrous even for the hand of an arbitrary monarch. Its division among the nobility and gentry was an expedient which removed the odium from royalty, and invested it with that munificence which dazzled the pride of Henry. In the vast harvest, the king refused the lion's share, looking for his safer portion in the secure loyalty of the new possessors to whom he transferred this vast and novel wealth.

As the scheme was managed, therefore, it was a compromise or copartnership of the king and his courtiers. The lands now lie the open prey of the hardy claimant or the sly intriguer; crowds of suppliants wearied the crown to participate in that national spoliation. Every one hastened to urge some former service or some present necessity as a colourable plea for obtaining a grant of some of the suppressed lands. A strange custom was then introduced, that of "begging for an estate." Kneeling to the king, and specifying some particular lands, was found a convenient method to acquire them; and these royal favours were sometimes capriciously and even ludicrously bestowed. Fuller has a pleasant tale concerning one Master Champernoun. One day, observing two or three gentlemen waiting at a door through which the king was to pass, he was inquisitive to learn their suit, which they refused to tell. On the king's appearance, they threw themselves on their knees, and Champernoun was prompt in joining them, with an implicit faith, says Fuller, that courtiers never ask anything hurtful to themselves. They were begging for an estate. The king granted their petition. On this Champernoun claimed his share of the largesse; they remonstrated that he had never come to beg with them; he appealed to the king, and his brother beggars were fain to allot him the considerable Priory of St. Germain, which he sold to the ancestor of the present possessor, the Earl of St. Germain.

The king was prodigal in his grants; for the more he multiplied the receivers of his bounties, the more numerous would be the staunch defenders of their new possessions.

The consequences of the Reformation were, in short, a new conquest of England, and a new partition of the territory among the courtiers and creatures of the king. The property of the universities, now held by the aristocracy as sacred to collegiate or corporation purposes, then excited the cupidity of the nobility, as they might again, if there were any chance of their obtaining a share of the spoils.

The bait was relishing, and there were some, when land-grants became more scarce, whose voracity of reformation attempted to snatch at the lands of the universities, which had certainly gone, had not Henry's love of literature protected their trembling colleges. We have his majesty's own words, in replying to the suggestion of some hungry courtier:—"Ha! sirrah! I perceive the abbey-lands have fleeced you, and set your teeth on edge, to ask also those colleges. We pulled down sin by defacing the monasteries, but you desire to throw down all goodness by subversion of colleges. I tell you, sir, that I judge no land in England better bestowed than on our universities, which shall maintain our realm when we be dead and rotten. Follow no more this vein, but content yourselves with what you have already, or else seek honest means whereby to increase your worldhoods."

Mr. D'Israeli is neither original nor singular in holding Henry the Eighth as a reformer who reformed nothing. On one fundamental point Henry seems to have been what is now termed a Puseyite. He would gladly have revoked the greatest boon which, as a reformer, he had boasted to have bestowed on the people,—the Word of God in their mother-tongue." In his last speech to his parliament, having strongly animadverted on the disunion, the schism which had followed the introduction of "ultra-Protestantism," as the Puseyites designate the Reformation, Henry proceeded:

"You lay too much stress on your own expositions and fantastical opinions. In such sublime matters you may easily mistake. This permission of reading the Bible is only designed for private information, not to furnish you with reprimanding phrases and expressions of reproach against priests and preachers. I am extremely sorry to find with how little reverence the Word of God is mentioned; how people squabble about the sense; how it is turned into wretched rhyme, sung and jingled in every alehouse and tavern." This part of the king's speech was pointed at the general readers of the Scriptures; but his majesty did not discover any happier union among the clergy themselves, whom he roundly rates:—"I am every day informed that you & the clergy are declaiming against each other in the pulpit; and here your charity and discretion are quite lost in vehemence and satire. Some are too stiff in their old mumpsimus, and others too busy and curious in their new sumpsimus.* Thus the pulpits are, as it were, batteries against each other; the noise is hostile and ruinous. How can we expect the poor people should live friendly with their neighbours when they have such unhappy precedents of discord and dissension in those that teach them?"

Henry the Eighth rejected the Pope, but surely he died a Romanist. His unwieldy huge form was lifted up from his deathbed that he might prostrate himself, and, in the writer's language, who, however, was a papist, "bury himself in the earth," to testify his reverence for "the real presence," when it was brought before him. His will, which, though it was put aside, was not the less the king's will, attested his last supplications to "the Virgin Mary, and all her holy company of Heaven." And he endowed an altar at Windsor, "to be honourably kept up with all things necessary for a daily mass, there to be read perpetually while the world shall endure." At the same time Henry endowed the poor knights of Windsor, upon condition that they should repeat their eternal masses for his soul. His magnificence was proportionate to his sins, but his perpetual masses, and the world, did not endure together.

This was a king in so far after the heart of the modern Oxford divines.

There is not more sound thinking, more profound sagacity displayed in any part of this work than in the author's estimate of the probable development of the character of Edward the Sixth. He describes him as—

A boy-king, and a puppet-prince, invested with supreme power, acting without any volition of his own. We are prepossessed in his favour by his laborious diary. It is however remarkable that no solitary entry made in that book of life, no chance effusion, disturbs the uninterrupted equanimity. Whether the young king signs for the decapitation of his two uncles, or jots down the burning of Joan of Kent, an Arian, and another of a Dutchman, a Socinian, or records how a live goose suspended had its head sliced off by those who run at the ring, they seem equally to be matters of course, and by him were only distinguished by their respective dates. A nation's hope has always been the flattering painter of every youthful prince who dies immaturely; in the royal youth is lamented the irreparable loss of the future great monarch. But his father had been the most glorious youthful prince who ever adorned a throne; and it would be hard to decide, by the heartless chronicle of Edward, whether such an imperturbable spirit would have closed his life as a Nero or a Titus. This unhappy young prince must have felt the utter misery of his condition, for his was that curse of power, when in its exercise power itself becomes powerless, while its hands must be directed by another's. Had the reign of Edward the Sixth been prolonged, we should have had a polemical monarch, if we may judge by a collection of texts of Scripture, in proof of the doctrine of justification by faith, which exists in his own handwriting, written in French, and dedicated to his uncle.

This was a calamitous period for the nation; we derive little consolation when we discover that not more than three centuries ago our ancestors were a semi-barbarous race! We seem to be consulting the annals of some Asiatic dynasty, when we see a royal nephew tranquilly affixing his signature to the death-warrants of his uncles; imprisonment or exile would have been too tender for these state-victims; we see one brother attainted by another, and the scaffold finally receiving both; and a Queen of England, in the captivity of the Romish superstition, hailing with a benediction her own autos da fé. What we should have gained had the accomplished prince lived, we cannot conjecture; but what the nation were spared by the death of the melancholy Mary, is not doubtful. Edward and Mary were opposite bigots; and both alike presumed that they were appointed to the work of sanctity; but every reform which requires to be carried on by coercion will long appear ambiguous to the better-tempered. The bigotry as well as the puerile taste of the prince appeared when he composed a comedy or interlude against "The Whore of Babylon" and "The False Gods;" but the brawls of polemics, at least, are more tolerable than torture and the sacrifice of fire.

Our author has expatiated with fondness on such genial themes as the characters of More, Raleigh, Hooker, Spenser, Shakspeare, and Sir Philip Sidney; and if he has not discovered much that is new regarding those fixed stars of English literature, he has, by disposing the old materials in the best lights, added not a little to their grace and beauty. The work also contains many chapters on such curious or recondite subjects as the First Jesuits in England; Reginald Scot's Discoverie of Witchcraft; The Books of the People; The First Printer; The First Libraries; The Difficulties of Primitive Authors; On Pamphlets; and many subjects of a similar kind, all bearing on that comprehensive subject, which, in one sense, embraces all others—the History of our Literature. Perhaps no man is so well adapted, by his peculiar studies, as well as by his tastes and powers—by his idiosyncrasy, as it were—to tell us of Dr. Dee the occult philosopher, or of the Rosicrucian Fludd, as Mr. D'Israeli. We are glad to find him bearing with a lenient hand on the follies and meanness of the great and wise, who are still but men, in his sketches of More, Raleigh, and Bacon, since to mankind their errors and weaknesses have long become innoxious.

We do not pretend, in these few and hasty pages, to give an adequate account of a voluminous and comprehensive work, which, though it comes before the world in an unfinished state, has nevertheless, for a long series of years, occupied the time of a man of letters, and which is closely connected with those studies which he has pursued for more than a half century. In proceeding with our imperfect notice, a few brief specimens, in different styles, will better explain the author's right to the title he has assumed for his work, and its true character, than anything that we could say:

THE MONKISH WRITERS.

No monastic writer, as an historian, has descended to posterity for the eminence of his genius; for the same stamp of mind gave currency to their works. Woe to the sovereign who would have clipped their wings! then "tongues talked and pens wrote" monkish. There was a proverb among them, that "The giver is blessed, but he who taketh away is accursed." None but themselves could appeal to Heaven, and for their crowned slaves they were not penurious of their beatitude. They knew to crouch as well as to thunder. They usually clung to the reigning party; and a new party or a change of dynasty was sure to change their chronicle pen. Hall, the chronicler of Henry the Eighth, at the first moment when it was allowable to speak distinctly concerning these monkish writers, observed, "These monastical persons, learned and unlettered, better fed than taught, took on them to write and register in the book of fame the arts, and doings, and politic governance of kings."

* This alludes to a well-known story of an old priest, who, having blunderingly used mumpsimus for sumpsimus, persisted in the error, alleging that he hated all novelties.

and princes." It seems not to have occurred to the chronicler of Henry the Eighth that, had not those monks "taken on them to write and register," we should have had no "Book of Fame." It is a duty we owe to truth to penetrate into the mysteries of monkery; but the monks will always retain their right to receive their large claims on our admiration of their labours.

We pass a brilliant and somewhat ambitiously written chapter on the literary character of Henry the Eighth, and come to the Books of the People, as they were found in and before his age.

The people of Europe, who had no other knowledge of languages than their own uncultivated dialects, seem to have possessed what, if we may so dignify it, we would call a fugitive literature of their own. It is obvious that the people could not be ignorant of the important transactions in their own land; transactions in which their fathers had been the spectators or the actors, the sons would perpetuate by their traditions; the names of their heroes had not died with them in the battle-field. Nor would the villain's subjection to the feudal lord spoil the merriment of the land, nor dull the quip of natural facetiousness.

Before the people had national books they had national songs. Even at a period so obscure as the days of Charlemagne, there were "most ancient songs, in which the acts and wars of the old kings were sung." These songs, which the secretary of Charlemagne has informed us, were sedulously collected by the command of that great monarch, are described by the secretary, according to his classical taste, as barbara et antiquissima carmina; "barbarous," because they were composed in the rude vernacular language; yet such was their lasting energy that they were, even in the eighth century, held to be "most ancient," so long had they dwelt in the minds of the people!

Our miserable populace had poets for themselves, whose looser carols were the joy of the streets or the fields. Unfortunately we only learn that they had such artless effusions, for these songs have perished on the lips of the singers. The monks were too dull or too cunning to chronicle the outpourings of a people whom they despised, and which assuredly would have often girded them to the quick. A humorous satire of this kind has stolen down to us in that exquisite piece of drollery and grotesque invention, "The Land of Cockayne." They had historical ballads which were rehearsed to all listeners; and it was from these "old ballads, popular through succeeding times," that William of Malmesbury tells us, that "he learned more than from books written expressly for the information of posterity," though he will not answer for their precise truth. They had also political ballads.

At a period when we glean nothing from any literature of the people, we find that it had a positive existence; for two chronicles and a collection of tales and theological poems were furnished for them in their native idiom, by writers who unquestionably sought for celebrity. The people, too, had what in every age has been their peculiar property—all the fragmentary wisdom of antiquity in those "Few Words to the Wise," so daily useful, or so apt in the contingencies of human life; proverbs and Æsopian fables, delightedly transmitted from father to son. The memories of the people were stored with short narratives; for a startling tale was not easily forgotten. They had songs of trades, appropriated to the different avocations of labourers. These were a solace to the solitary task-worker, or threw a cheering impulse when many were employed together. Such Hall aptly describes as Sung to the wheel, and sung unto the payle.

These songs are found among the people of every country; and these effusions were the true poetry of the heart, which kept alive their social feelings. The people had even the greater works brought down for them to a diminutive size; the lays of minstrelsy were usually fragments of the metrical chronicles, or a disjointed tale from some romance; such as the popular Fabliaux, which form the amusing collection of Le Grand.

These proverbs and these fables, these songs and these tales,—all these were a library without books, till the day arrived when the people had books of their own, open to their comprehension, and responding to their sympathies.

A catalogue of the chap-books which then formed the library of the people, is given, including, of course, Guy of Warwick, Tom Thumb, and Jack the Giant Killer: and we have also a list of the People's Books of France, Germany, and Italy. The section of the work entitled The War against Books, or rather against the free diffusion of knowledge among the people, is much more important. The true character and awful tendency of that curious machine which, at its first discovery, was only viewed as it facilitated the process of making copies of a monkish chronicle or metrical romance, was not all at once suspected. The king, the archbishop, or some great noble, patronized the ingenious toy by which copies were multiplied, quite unsuspecting of the slumbering strength of this infernal machine; but the war against knowledge, which has been carried on ever since with vigour and varied success, was speedily proclaimed.

The day of portents was not slow in its approach—a stirring age pressed on, an age for books. Under Henry the Eighth, books became the organs of the passions of mankind, and were not only printed, but spread about; for if the presses of England dared not disclose the hazardous secrets of the writers, the people were surreptitiously furnished with English books from foreign presses. It was then that the jealousy of the state opened its hundred eyes on the awful track of the strange omnipotence of the press. Then first began that WAR AGAINST BOOKS which has not ceased in our time.

Perhaps he who first, with a statesman's prescient view, had contemplated on this novel and unknown power, and, as we shall see, had detected its insidious steps stealing into the cabinet of the sovereign, was the great minister [Wolsey] of this great monarch. It has been surmised that the cardinal aimed to crush the head of the serpent, by stopping the printing press in the monastery at St. Albans, of which he was the abbot; for that press remained silent for half a century. In a convocation the cardinal expressed his hostility against printing; assuring the simple clergy that, if they did not in time suppress printing, printing would suppress them. This great statesman, at this early period, had taken into view its remote consequences. Lord Herbert has curiously assigned to the cardinal his ideas as addressed to the pope:—"This new invention of printing has produced various effects of which your holiness cannot be ignorant. If it has restored books and learning, it has also been the occasion of those sects and schisms which daily appear. Men begin to call in question the present faith and tenets of the church; and the laity read the Scriptures, and pray in their vulgar tongue. Were this suffered, the common people might come to believe that there was not so much use of the clergy. If men were persuaded that they could make their own way to God, and in their ordinary language as well as Latin, the authority of the mass would fall, which would be very prejudicial to our ecclesiastical orders. The mysteries of religion must be kept in the hands of priests—the secret and arcanum of church government. Nothing remains more to be done than to prevent further apostacy. For this purpose, since printing could not be put down, it were best to set up learning against learning; and, by introducing able persons to dispute, to suspend the laity between fears and controversies. Since printing cannot be put down, it may still be made useful." Thus the statesman, who could not by a single blow annihilate this monster of all schism, would have wrestled with it with a statesman's policy.

The cardinal at length was shaken by terrors he had never before felt from the hated press. This minister had writhed under the printed personalities of the rabid SKELTON and the merciless ROR; but a pamphlet in the form of "The Supplication of Beggars" is a famed invective, which served as a prelude to the fall of the minister.

The first struggles of the printers and publishers, whose callings were then united, against those patents, which have lasted to our own day, is noticeable from the fact, that free trade prospered even then in despite of monopoly, to the extent of demonstrating what were its native energies, and what might have been its triumphs if untrammelled. The section affords a brief history of the English press.

There is an able section tracing the rise and progress of that other formidable agent in modern society, which has been christened Public Opinion; which first began to take a visible shape during the reign of Henry the Eighth, and the struggles of the Reformation; and which, in the reign of his daughter, had become a formidable power, which it was the object of her wary ministers to direct and control. This section also affords a brilliant historical picture of the transition and the rapid advancement of English society in the Elizabethan period, when there was first found a soil in which public opinion might take root and germinate.

When Elizabeth ascended the throne, there was yet no recognised "public" in the commonwealth; the people were mere fractional and incoherent parts of society. This heroic queen, whose position and whose masculine character bear some affinity to those of the great Catherine of Russia, had to create a "people" subservient to the very design of advancing the regal authority in its ascendancy. The policy of the maiden queen was that of her ancestors; but the same jealousy of the aristocracy turned her genius to a new source of influence, unknown to her progenitors, and which her successors afterwards hardly recognised. In the awful mutations through which society had been passing, some had been silently favourable to the queen's views. The population had considerably risen since the reign of Henry the Seventh. Property had changed hands, and taken new directions; and independent classes in society were rising fast.

The great barons formerly had kept open houses for all comers and goers; five hundred or a thousand "blue coats" in a single family crowded their castles or their mansions; these were "trencher slaves" and "swash-bucklers;" besides those numerous "retainers" of great lords, who, neither menial nor of the household, yet yielded their services on special occasions, for the privilege of shielding their own insolence under the ostentatious silver "badge," or the family arms, which none might strike with impunity, and escape from the hostility of the whole noble family. In the opening scene of Romeo and Juliet our national bard has perpetuated the insolence of the wearers with all the reality of nature and correctness of custom. Such troops of idling partisans were only reflecting among themselves the feuds and the pride of their rival masters; shadows of the late civil wars which still lingered in the land.

The first blow at the independent grandeur of the nobles had been struck by the grandfather of the queen; the second was the consequence of the acts of her father. The new proprietors of the recently-acquired abbey-lands, and other monastic property, were not only courtiers, but their humbler dependents; many of them the commissioners who had undervalued all these manors and lordships, that they might get such "Robin Hood's pennyworths" more easily by the novelty of "begging" for them. These formed a new body of proprietors, who gradually constituted a new gentry, standing between the nobles and the commonalty; and from the nature of their property they became land-jobbers, letting and underletting, raising rents, enhancing the prices of commodities, enclosing the common lands, and swallowing up the small farms by large ones. There arose in consequence a great change in agricultural pursuits, no longer practised to acquire a miserable subsistence; the land was changed into a new mine of wealth; and among the wealthiest classes of English subjects were the graziers, who indeed became the founders of many families.

The nobles found their revenues declining, as an excess of expenditure surprised them; this changeable state only raised their murmurs, for they seemed insensible to the cause. Their ancient opulence was secretly consuming itself; their troops of domestics were thinned in numbers; and a thousand families disappeared, who once seemed to have sprung out of the soil, where whole generations had flourished through the wide domains of the lord. A great change had visibly occurred in the baronial halls. The octogenarians in Elizabeth's later days complained that the country was depopulating fast; and the chimneys of the great mansions which had smoked the year round, now scarcely announced "a merry Christmas."

A transition from one state of society to another will always be looked on suspiciously by those who may deem the results problematical; but it will be eagerly opposed by those who find the innovation unfavourable to themselves. The results of the new direction of landed property, incomprehensible to the nobles, were abhorrent to the feelings of the people. Among "the people," that is the populace, there still survived tender reminiscences of the warmth of the abbot's kitchens; and many a wayfaring guest could tell how erst by ringing at the monastic gate the wants of life had been alleviated. The monks, too, had been excellent landlords, living amid their tenants; and while the husbandmen stood at easy rents, the public markets were regularly maintained by a constant demand. In the breaking up of the monasteries many thousands of persons had been dispersed; and it would seem that among that sturdy community of vagabonds which now rose over the land, some low Latin words in their "pedlar's French," as the canting language they devised is called, indicate their origin from the familiar dialect of the ejected poor scholars of the late monastic institutions.

The commotions which rose in all parts of the country during the brief reign of Edward the Sixth were instigated by the ancient owners of these lands, who conceiving that they had been disinherited by the spoliators; thus weakly they avenged their irrecoverable losses; nor did such leaders want for popular pretences among a discontented populace, who, as they imagined, were themselves sufferers in the common cause. We are informed, on the indubitable authority of the diary of the youthful Edward, that "the people had conceived a wonderful hatred against GENTLEMEN, whom they held as their enemies." The king seems distinctly to distinguish the gentry from the nobility.

In the decline of the great households a result however occurred, which tended greatly to improve the independent condition of "the people." The manual arts had been practised from generation to generation, the son succeeding the father in the wide domains of some noble; but when the great lords were contracting the scale of their establishments, and failed to furnish occupation to these dependents, the mechanics and artificers took refuge in the towns; there localized, they were taught to reap the fruits of their own daily industry; and as their labour became more highly appreciated, and the arts of commerce were more closely pursued, they considerably heightened the cost of those objects of necessity or pleasure which supplied the wants or the luxuries of the noble. In becoming citizens, they ceased to be mere domestics in the great households; a separate independence was raised between the lord & the his mechanic ; the humble class lost something in leaving the happy carelessness of life for a condition more anxious and precarious ; but the influence of the noble was no longer that of the lord paramount, but simply the influence of the customer over the tradesman ; " an influence," as Hume shrewdly remarks, " which can never be dangerous to civil government."

We now distinctly perceive new classes in civil society rising out of the decline of the preponderating power of the great barons, and of the new disposition of landed property ; the gentry, the flourishing agriculturist, and those mechanics and artificers who carried on their trades, independently of their former lordly patrons ; we now, therefore, discern the first elements of popularity.

There was now " a people " who might be worthy of entering into the views of the statesman ; but it was a divided people. Among them, the queen knew, lay concealed her domestic enemies ; a more novel religion than the new was on the watch to shake her established church ; and no inconsiderable portion of her subjects in their papal consciences were traitors. The arts of juncture, or the keeping together parts broken and separated, making hearts compliant which were stubbornly opposed to each other, demanded, at once, the firmness and the indulgence of the wisest policy ; and such was the administration of Elizabeth.

No part of this elaborate, if fragmentary work, is more agreeable in subject, more elegant in style, or so likely to be generally popular, as the rambling essays, half biographical, half critical, on Spenser, Sidney, Raleigh, and those master-spirits of early English literature, who are quite as interesting and memorable in their personal history as in their great works. It is those desultory criticisms, guesses, and accidental hints, thrown out from a fertile mind, which will give the work a peculiar charm with the literary lounge. In this respect much of it resembles the after-breakfast conversation, the dialogues full of point and amenity, of a party of learned men, in whom dry scholarship has not destroyed sympathy with any of the forms in which the genius of a people are manifested. Mr. D'Israeli finds beauty in them all ; and displays a healthful and nearly a universal relish. For him the Saxon chroniclers are not too homely and rude ; Piers Ploughman, or, to come far downward, Sir Philip Sidney, too quaint, nor Drayton, too minute and tedious. He has not mere charity, but a hearty liking for them all—even to the most obscure of the tribe ; and loving all sorts of authors and adepts, he reserves his severity for the statesmen. We can only hope that Mr. D'Israeli's book will be received in the same spirit in which it is conceived.

CHAPTERS ON ENGLISH POETRY.

MOORE, KEATS, CRABBE, CAMPBELL, AND ROGERS.

CHAPTER III.

It is fitting that Moore should follow Byron, though not so much so that he should be associated with Keats. They are here classed together, however, on account of the principal characteristic of both being the same, although exhibited in a very different manner. Luxuriance, in all likelihood, will be the peculiar feature attributed to them in future criticism.

There are two potential names we have been accustomed to hear spoken with an unaccountable flippancy. The first of these is Southey, the second, Moore. And yet the character of Moore, both as a poet and a patriot, is such as to merit the highest respect. He has served his country as few Irishmen have done, and in a manner most allied to their nature, as well as his own, by the pathos of injured feeling and the satire of urbane wit.

Moore's study of the Irish melodies, which are almost all plaintive, and the taste towards which Byron led, and which considered a shade of melancholy necessary to beauty, coincided in his mind to produce that sentimental affectation, which is one of the worst evils of his works. By such passages as these—

Oh, ever thus from childhood's hour
I've seen my fondest hopes decay ;
I never loved a tree or flower,
But 'twas the first to fade away.

I never nursed a dear gazelle
To glad me with its soft black eye ;
But when it came to know me well,
And love me, it was sure to die.

This brilliant writer, and as brilliant man of the world, has contributed to a result the most foreign to his nature. But this, however, is only a casualty,—there are correctives enough in his works for such feelings ; but the fashionable taste picks up whatever is akin to itself, and reacts upon the author, and thus these verses are the most generally admired of all Moore's poetry. Revelling in all riches, and animated with vivid enjoyment, his tales have a foolish air of melancholy that suits but ill with their other qualities. Sheridan said well of him—" that there was no man who put so much of his heart into his fancy as Tom Moore : that his soul seemed a particle of fire separated from the sun, and always fluttering to get back to the source of light and heat." The gorgeous voluptuousness of the East is too little for him : he adds whatever is bright or rare in antiquity or art ; he covers the exquisitely inwrought pavement with flowers, and winnows the air with scented fans ; and then, by way of heightening the luxury, makes the inhabitants of this artificial paradise the unhappy objects of our sympathy. Thus the enchantress in the " Fire-worshippers," who lives on flowers, a fine unearthly life, when she is supplied with her favourite blossoms,

Bending to drink their balmy airs,
As if she mixed her soul with theirs, recalls in her song no images but those of a regretful nature, and ever recurs to the remembrance that to-morrow they will fade. Thank Heaven they will, and everything else, and make room for new flowers and new dreams, as well as new fruit and new poetry.

I know where the wing'd visions dwell,
That around the night-bed play;
I know each herb and flowret's bell,
Where they hide their wings by day.
Then hasten we, maid,
To twine our braid,
To-morrow the dreams and flowers will fade.

Delightful all these verses are, and yet not half so delightful as many he has given us. But when we ask ourselves why they are so, the question is somewhat more difficult to answer to our reason, than to acknowledge to our sense; it is, in short, a species of deceit: and even those who would assent to the truth of the proposition, that the best philosophy of life is to be comfortably cheated, are not contented with it. The charm rests on the principle of contrast, and that principle refined upon to its furthest.

In this respect, as well as others, Moore's poetry has, in style, a strong resemblance to Byron's. So much is this the case that, in a critical analysis for the purpose of classifying our poetical writings, these two may be almost comprehended under the same category. He did for the lovely what Byron did for the darker passions: concentrating them into essence; making harmonies by congregating the like and sympathetic, he decorated the objects of sense by sweet fancy, and diluted the gem of love in the wine of the senses. Not only did he "paint the lily, gild refined gold, and add fresh perfume to the violet," as Hazlitt says of him, but he makes the lily more beautiful by its juxtaposition to the rose, and extracts the sentiment from the jessamine flower by its neighbourhood to the ivy. This sort of poetry oversteps the bounds of simple refinement—that is, refinement retaining for its object the enjoyment of natural pleasures—it is refinement becoming diseased, as a vast accumulation of wealth tends to make it. His writings and those of Byron would almost make us believe that the poetry of former artificial ages was worth nothing, and that there never was such a thing as the Art (technically speaking) of poetry until they invented it; and what they invented they have completed. But man cannot live by bread alone; and most assuredly not by smiles, and much less by tears. Thus has Moore contributed his share to the grand revolution, and assisted us in drawing broadly and definitely the distinction between sense and soul,—the organic body and the living thought by which that body is.

Moore has done more than this. He and Southey have extended the charm of the affections further than had been done before; they have dealt with them the same, whether the scenery of their poetry was in Persia, or Arabia, or at home: they have represented the same passions everywhere, and overlooked the modifications of the moral nature which climate and faith induce. Heretofore it had been otherwise: we were accustomed to describe oriental life with a self-congratulating sanctimony, and wilful colouring of prejudice. The tales which had followed on the translating of the Arabian Nights were no exception to this. They were lifeless, and mere vehicles for their morals; being only chosen for the convenience of their machinery.

The author could address Mahomet without bringing on himself the charge of disrespect to religion which the use of the name of God in that way might have done. Now we make the inhabitants of that

Sweet Indian land
Whose air is balm, whose ocean spreads
O'er coral rocks and amber beds;
Whose sandal groves and beds of spice,
Might be a Peri's paradise, offer their adoration in the same spirit of love and hope to the same great Spirit who claims the temples and the censers more near home. We now refer religion to its source, to the well-spring of the heart, and separate it quite from the polemical conditions to which it has been annexed by our forefathers. Matters of faith are above, and would be impertinent in the present writing; we speak not of them, and this Moore has also avoided doing. But he has assisted in extending the brotherhood of our common nature to all; and this is Christianizing the world. In the story of the Peri, the outcast of paradise wanders about in search of the gift that is most dear to heaven. First she caught the blood-drop of a warrior fighting for liberty.

"Sweet," said the angel, as she gave
The gift into her radiant hand;
"Sweet is the welcome of the brave
Who die thus for their native land;—
But see, alas! the crystal bar
Of Eden moves not; holier far
Than even this drop the boon must be
That opes the gate of heaven for thee!"

Next she receives the sigh of a maiden, whose affection for her lover was stronger than that for life; but "Not yet,"

The angel said, as with regret
He shut from her that glimpse of glory.

She goes on her search again, and it is a tear of penitence which at last admits her into heaven.

The great chamberlain Fadladeen's choice sentence of criticism on this poem: "And this is poetry! this flimsy manufacture of the brain, which, in comparison with the lofty and durable monuments of genius, is as the gold filagree work of Zamora beside the eternal architecture of Egypt!"—This criticism which Moore delivers on himself may be repeated to every poem he has written. But there is a time for everything, and, de gustibus non disputandum; the lightest fabric of the silk-worm may have its value as well as the inconsumable asbestos. It is not with these works, in size so much more important, that the name of Moore will be associated. He has done much more for the Irish music than Burns did for the Scotch; and these melodies, like —ladies from a far countrie, Beautiful exceedingly, are married for ever in the beating heart of the Irish nation to the pathos of his verses.

The Irish music, indeed, has been first collected by means of the assistance which he rendered. "These airs," he says, "like too many of our countrymen, for want of protection at home, have passed into the service of foreigners;" and the composers on the continent have enriched their operas and sonatas with melodies borrowed from Ireland. "But we are come," he continues, "to a better period both of politics and music; and how much they are connected, in Ireland at least, appears too plainly in the tone of sorrow and depression which characterizes most of our early songs." The immense popularity of many of these lyrical pieces, not only in Ireland but also in this country and abroad, is abundant proof of the success with which he has performed his task, and have greatly contributed to the regeneration he so confidently anticipates.

Like the bright lamp that shone in Kildare's holy fane,
And burned through long ages of darkness and storm,
Is the heart that afflictions have come o'er in vain,
Whose spirit outlives them unfading and warm!
Erin! oh, Erin! thus bright through the tears
Of a long night of bondage thy spirit appears!

Unchill'd by the rain, and unawak'd by the wind,
The lily lies sleeping through winter's cold hour,
Till spring, with a touch her dark slumber unbind,
And daylight and liberty bless the young flower.
Erin! oh, Erin! thy winter is past,
And the hope that lived through it shall blossom at last.

Keats' life was a short one: what share he would have taken, had he lived longer, in the drama whose characters we are now enumerating, it is not easy to say; and yet perhaps he performed his part. After life's fitful fever he sleeps well; and the epitaph which disappointed energies of body dictated, will be remembered only as a poetic incident in a poet's death.

It may be said of Keats that his character and enthusiasm approached more nearly to those of what we poetically term a poet. He seems to have studied and written, not because he loved what he described, so much as that the exercise of his faculty of description gave him delight. He could not resist his inclination to suit ideas with poetic words. He was under a spell, and not properly awake, reasoning and choosing. He loved all things in proportion as they furnished materials for his embroidery, or gave him dyes wherewith to beautify the rainbow of his verse. His intense appreciation of beauty must have been oppressive to him; he must have felt in contemplating it, as in his "Ode to a Nightingale"—

My heart aches, and a drowsy numbness pains
My sense, as though of hemlock I had drunk,
Or emptied some dull opiate to the drains
One minute past, and Lethe-wards had sunk:
'Tis not through envy of thy happy lot,
But being too happy in thy happiness,—
That thou, light-winged Dryad of the trees,
In some melodious plot
Of beechen green, and shadows numberless,
Singest of summer in full-throated ease.

He must have extended his arms with longing supplication for more and more power in embodying what he desired, as in the stanzas following:—

Oh for a draught of vintage that hath been Cool'd a long age in the deep delved earth,
Tasting of Flora and the country green,
Dance, and Provencal song, and sunburnt mirth!

Oh for a beaker full of the warm South,
Full of the true, the blissful Hippocrene,
With beaded bubbles winking at the brim,
And purple-stained mouth;
That I might drink and leave the world unseen,
And with thee fade away into the forest dim.

Away, away, for I will fly with thee
Not charioted by Bacchus and his pards,
But on the viewless wings of poesy,
Though the dull brain perplexes and retards:
Already with thee! tender is the night,
And the Queen-Moon is on her throne,
Clustered around by all her starry Fays;
But here there is no light,
Save what from heaven is with the breezes blown
Through verdurous glooms and winding mossy ways.

I cannot see what flowers are at my feet,
Nor what soft incense hangs upon the boughs,
But in embalm'd darkness, guess each sweet
Wherewith the seasonable month endows
The grass, the thicket, and the fruit-tree wild,
White hawthorn, and the pastoral eglantine;
Fast-fading violets cover'd up in leaves:
And Mid-May's eldest child,
The coming musk-rose full of dewy wine,
The murmurous haunt of flies on summer eves.

* * * * *
Adieu! the fancy cannot cheat so well
As she is famed to do, deceiving elf.
Adieu! adieu! thy plaintive anthem fades
Past the near meadows, over the still stream,
Up the hill side; and now 'tis buried deep
In the next valley glades:
Was it a vision, or a waking dream?
Fled is that music:—Do I wake or sleep?

He loved poetry for itself alone. His great desire was to aggrandize ideas by the dress in which he presented them to the reader. The fitness of words to convey a feeling of objects claimed his transcendent admiration. It was never enough for him that the object was presented in its true light to the understanding; the sense must also appreciate it. He wished to paint with words. As might have been thus expected, his poetry affords the most beautiful examples of imagery. How fine, for instance, how very grand, is the following metaphor:—

There was a listening fear in her regard,
As if calamity had just begun;
As if the canward clouds of evil days
Had spent their malice, and the sullen rear
Was with its stored thunder labouring up.

The rhythm here gives immense value to the sense; it gives as much as the pooriness of the sound of the first, second, and last lines in the following passage in Wordsworth—so grand in itself—takes away from the effect.

Like a sea-beast crawl'd forth, which on a shelf
Of rock or sand reposed there to sun himself;
Such seemed this man, not all alive or dead,
Nor all asleep in his extreme old age.
Motionless as a cloud the old man stood,
That heareth not the loud winds when they call,
And moveth altogether if it move at all.

It was not enough that he should work out an end by means of his poem, and raise an interest in its progress; each notion and each image was it self all important—it was a poem, and could stoop to no other idea or image as its superior. All this was the result of the fervency of youth, as well as of his idiosyncrasy: it was the ebullience of one to whom to live was luxury. To feel the air fanning his face was to him a happiness like love; and something very like “the large utterance of the early gods,” in some parts of Hyperion especially, where

The ponderous syllables, like sullen waves
In the half-glutted hollows of reef rocks
Come booming, was given him whereby to convey to others the plenitude of his pleasure—a pleasure not unmixed with pain.

It may be inferred from this manner of defining Keats' powers, that we are not to look for much through his means being added to our poetry, or new influences communicated to its future condition; but it is not so. His poetry contains a moral as important as that of either of those already noticed. He filled an important place in the diversity of the age, and without him its canonical completeness would be diminished. He was not a doubter like Byron, nor did he seem to entertain seriously any thought of an abstract kind. His faith was in Nature: in the present and the ancient fable was his only theology.

But Keats' version of that creed, his embodiment of the Greek spirit is not his own; if it had, he would have been a more marvellous youth than we have ever beheld. Our early translations, so different from those that followed in the French-classic period, furnish a key whereby to understand the poetry of Keats. In the “Hero and Leander,” begun by Marlow and completed by Chapman, and in other poems by the same authors, we meet with passages almost parallel. His choice of subjects was exactly such as Coleridge attributed to young genius—the most remote from every-day interests. He says—“I hope I have not at too late a day touched the beautiful mythology of Greece;” as a reproducer in form he was too late—in spirit perhaps too early. It was set down to him as affectation. Besides, he did not anticipate in his love that there was a reason in passion, or that a departure from the model was sometimes all the difference between truth and peculiarity. A revival or an exclusive study of any phase of the human mind which has been passed in the advancement of knowledge, is unfit for a wide and permanent audience. If fable be employed, as by its nature it is intended to be, and as there can be no doubt it was employed by those who invented it, and as Shelley has used it in “Prometheus Unbound,” or as Goëthe appears to have done in “Helena,” in shadowing out of arcane matters whose simple annunciation would be too abstract for any faculty but that of pure reason, then it can never be too late to apply to it as a poetic vehicle. But Keats did not so use it: he did not resort to it for the meanings which lay hid beneath, but only for the excellent art in which these meanings were enveloped: he was a worshipper of the creature: he chose his mistress for the beauty of her face more than for that of her mind. Thus far his poetry is the acknowledgment of a principle and no further. He had not advanced far enough to add the hidden thought to the rare fabric of symbol. His muse is the statue of Pygmalion the instant before it is animated; and he is the sculptor lost between admiration of what he has created, and what he desires.

The whole poem of “Endymion” is filled with this feeling. His inmost consciousness is alive to a communion with the outward world. There is a language spoken to him which he cannot wholly understand. The love-sick loses himself in his feeling:—

What is there in thee, Moon! that thou shouldst move
My heart so potently! When yet a child
I oft have dried my tears when thou hast smiled.
Thou seem'dst my sister: hand in hand we went
From eve to morn across the firmament.
No apples would I gather from the tree,
Till thou hadst cooled their cheeks deliciously:
No tumbling water ever spake romance,
But when mine eye with thine thereon could dance:
No woods were green enough, no bower divine,
Until thou liftedst up thine eyelids fine:
In sowing-time ne'er would I dibble take
Or drop a seed till thou wast wide awake;
And in the summer-tide of blossoming,
No one but thee hath heard me blithely sing
And meshed my dewy flowers all the night.
No melody was like a passing spright,
If it went not to solemnize thy reign.
Yes, in my boyhood every joy and pain
By thee were fashioned to the self-same end:
And as I grew in years, still didst thou blend
With all my ardours; thou wast the deep glen;
Thou wast the mountain-top—the sage's pen—
The poet's harp—the voice of friends—the sun;
Thou wast the river—thou wast glory won;
Thou wast my clarion's blast—thou wast my steed:
My goblet full of wine—my topmost deed:—
Thou wast the charm of women, lovely Moon!
Oh, what a wild and harmonized tune
My spirit struck from all the beautiful!

And thus it was with the poet himself. Endymion is visited in sleep by the lunar goddess Diana, and while awake and gazing on the white orb he cannot understand what influence it is that overpowers him. And at last he returns to this simple exclamation,

Oh, what a wild and harmonized tune
My spirit struck from all the beautiful!

But in truth it was not merely because it was beautiful that the “gentle orb” so moved him. Beauty it was to the sense, but no further; the sentiment he experienced was inspired by the spirit that dwelt within. Keats was ever thus perplexed: the poetic and the visible world to which it was allied, were beautiful both, but they were more than beautiful. Untroubled waters suggest peace; and as we love peace we love to gaze upon untroubled waters. It is this coincidence we call the beautiful. Bright colours in quick transition remind us of gaiety, and colouring in gradation—as in the rainbow—of harmony. For their own sakes we care little about them: but in Keats' poetry the sense of beauty is the ultimate endeavour. There is little unitarianism, and, it is to be feared, less trinitarianism in this: it is the very threshold of the religion of the Greeks, but no further than the threshold.

CRABBE, CAMPBELL, ROGERS.

These writers are among the most firmly fixed in the public esteem: their works are not of the order that raise party prejudices, their beauties are such as all can understand. They are here enumerated, not so much owing to their importance, or their relation to the period, as from the circumstance of their being distinct from it. They are (with many great names on the rolls of the muses) writers of verse rather than poets. They go about their productions with a laudable desire to avoid ambiguity of sentiment, falsity of reasoning, or any necessity of explanation: they are always innocent of these faults, but their innocence is the result of the wrong cause,—they are too timid to go wrong, Crabbe only being too strong to be driven from the right.

The style of Crabbe forms a link between the past and the present, the days when Burke and Sir J. Reynolds were the great authorities and arbiters, and these degenerate days when The Edinburgh and Quarterly have taken upon themselves a more extensive and yet more party unpopularity;—between the days of Goldsmith and of Byron. Crabbe, in his preface to the republication of his earlier poems, mentions his acquaintance with the great men deceased, and also the fact of his poems having been submitted to Johnson for his judgment. That the verdict of this powerful mind would be favourable was to have been expected; and that he—although not too ready to give his meed of admiration—should approve highly of “The Village” and “The Library” was not surprising. They are poems which would be agreeable varieties at that time, while they are quite deficient in variety now. Dr. Johnson said of them—“They are original, vigorous, and elegant;” and such are the revolutions of criticism, only one of these high qualities would be granted to them without modification when viewed among our later poetry. Precision of study is Crabbe’s most valuable feature, and this expended on its most proper subjects—homely pictures of every-day humble life. Poetry he looks upon as good sense in a modest although a holiday dress, and as a matter which it behoved him to improve in as he became an older man, or at least that he should deprecate the expectation of this in his readers. “Certainly,” says he, “were it the principal employment of a man’s life to compose verses, it might seem reasonable to expect, that he would continue to improve as long as he continued to live; though there is some doubt whether such improvement would follow, and perhaps proof might be adduced to show that he would not: but when to this ‘idle trade’ is added some ‘calling’ with superior claims on his attention, his progress in the art will probably be in proportion neither to the years he has lived, nor even to the attempts he has made.”

Crabbe is not led away by any theory, or any notion or affection peculiar to himself; nor does he address himself to any particular class. The interest of his piece is never dependent on any doubtful moral, nor on any effect borrowed from the treatment it receives from him. His whole confidence is placed on the stern delineation of actual life, for the observation of which his clerical position gave him opportunity. His “Hall” and “Parish Register” remind us, in their lower qualities, of Galt, some of whose pictures are the most remarkably distinct that have ever been produced. Whenever Crabbe leaves this immediate imitation of his model, he fails utterly; while he keeps within it, his correctness is perfect. “In ‘The Parish Register’ the reader will find an endeavour once more to describe village manners, not by adopting the notion of pastoral simplicity, or assuming ideas of rustic barbarity, but by more natural views of the peasantry, considered as a mixed body of persons, sober or profligate, and hence, in a great measure, contented or miserable.” This, and no more, is the sum of all his poems; and it is a great field he has chosen. This announcement is all that he gives—no merit is assumed for resorting to a purer mode of study—no flattering himself with the glory of having broken through convention, (which he has done in all but his metre)—no founding of a school, nor appealing to posterity.

But the great correctness of detail in some of his descriptions is an evil more than a good, as the scenes he describes are of a nature we would rather avoid. Perhaps it ought not to be so, perhaps we ought to be ready to hear and to be witnesses of all the ills that flesh is heir to, and draw instruction from all of them; but still it is otherwise in experience—we willingly leave the sick-ward with its odours of sour poultices to the surgeon who can assist, and the nurses who make them. Like Lillo’s tragedies, they want the elevating beauty which all works of the imitative arts ought to possess. In his choice of subject, however, he has a high moral purpose. Crime and folly in all their forms receive from his hand their punishment. He shows “vice its own feature,” amply proving the truth of the observation—

Vice to be hated needs but to be seen.

Indeed no one could, almost by any possibility, give us a more degrading sense of shame and disgust for those evils which poverty breeds among men. Elliott cannot; there is a vindictive heroism about all that he writes, which dignifies his most miserable scenes; he appeals in anguish to us all: he carries the nobility of independence and manhood even into the foulest disease and most abject proneness. Crabbe details the particulars, and leaves them unredeemed.

Now turn our view from dwellings simply neat
To this infected Row we term our Street.

Here, in cabal, a disputatious crew
Each evening meet;—the sot, the cheat, the shrew.
Riots are nightly heard:—the curse, the cries
Of beaten wife, perverse in her replies,
While shrieking children hold each threatening hand!
And sometimes life, and sometimes food demand:
Boys in their first stolen rage, to swear begin,
And girls, who heed not dress, are skilled in gin.
Snarers and smugglers here their gains divide;
Ensnaring females here their victims hide:
And here is one the Sybil of the Row,
Who knows all secrets, or affects to know.

Between the road-way and the walls, offence
Invades all eyes and strikes on every sense:
There lie, obscene, at every open door,
Heaps from the hearth and sweepings from the floor:

And day by day the mingled masses grow
As sinks are disemboved and kennels flow.

See on the floor what frowzy patches rest !
What nauseous fragments on yon fractured chest !
What downy dust beneath yon window seat !
And round these posts that serve the bed for feet !
This bed where all those tattered garments lie,
Worn by each sex, and now perforce thrown by !
See ! as we gaze, an infant lifts its head,
Left by neglect, and burrow'd in that bed ;
The mother-gossip has the love suppress,
An infant's cry once wakened in her breast ;
And daily prattles, as her round she takes,
(With strong resentment) of the want she makes.

All this horror is only the naked truth : but Crabbe's writings were addressed to a higher order than those whose moral evils he details ; and it may be gravely asked if his poetry has done any good—has had any influence in counteracting the curse which has descended, and is descending with a mildew blight among us. And is it just to answer in the following manner the question which he there propounds ?

Whence all those woes ! From want of virtuous will,
Of honest shame, or time-improving skill ;
From want of care t' employ the vacant hour,
And want of everything, but want of power.

But Crabbe has a right to answer his own question. He was a man of powerful as well as "virtuous will," and wrought out his own honours by perseverance and a cautious and sound judgment. His poetry stands little danger of sinking in reputation ; it never attained a great height, and will never be moved from the elevation it has rested on.

And this is also the case with Campbell. Possessed of a more adorned mind than Crabbe, and of a thousand-fold more vivid and ambitious fancy, he has chosen nearly as safe, though not so justly poetic, ground. The fortune of the "Pleasures of Hope" indeed, was very different from that of the "Village !" it rose into extraordinary celebrity immediately on its publication ; and soon settled into the quiet enjoyment of the character of a favourite. Not a favourite, perhaps, with the graver and more intellectual, but a favourite with everybody, which (as has been observed) either means nobody, or at best that no one is offended.

His lyrical poems are the best of his productions, and some of them are exceedingly fine. The honour of having done something towards gaining every battle which crowned the naval flag with so much glory during the war, has been claimed for Dibdin. It has been said that his songs had an effect so salutary and so national that the seamen were inspired by them to more courageous achievements. Campbell's heroic songs and ballads are of a higher order than those of Dibdin, and worthy of being associated with our proudest military honours. "The Battle of the Baltic," "Hohenlinden," and others, will be remembered and admired by all who remember and admire the events they celebrate. The popularity of the "Pleasures of Hope," has given that poem the principal place in speaking of Campbell's works ; but it is not by any means deserving of that distinction. Gertrude of Wyoming, a tale of American colonization, exquisitely told, is the poem on which the greatest weight of fame must rest. If it was within the scope of these pages to criticise the style and the conduct of particular poems, (except in as far as some general principle may be illustrated by so doing,) this would be one to occupy us. The character of Outalissi is one of the finest things of the kind ever done :—

Far differently the mute Oneyda took
His calumet of peace, and cup of joy ;
As monumental bronze, unchanged his look ;
A soul that pity touched but never shook.
Trained from his tree-rook'd cradle to his bier,
The fierce extremes of good and ill to brook ;
Impassive—fearing but the shame of fear—
A stoic of the woods—a man without a tear.

One thing ought to be observed of Campbell. His name is identified with the struggle for liberty which Poland has maintained so long against the overwhelming force of Russia, and the other states who shared with it in the partition of that kingdom. From time to time he has raised his voice in favour of the indomitable Poles, ever since the publication of his first work in which he alluded to their wrongs in lines which have long been familiar to every one :—

When leagued Oppression pour'd to Northern wars
Her whistler'd pandours and her fierce hussars,
Waved her dread standard to the breeze of morn,
Peal'd her loud drum, and twanged her trumpet horn ;
Tumultuous horrors brooded o'er her van,
Pressing wrath to Poland—and to man !

Rogers is still more an elegant writer than Campbell, but much less vigorous. His sentences are composed with elaborate care, and every figure and line is unobjectionable in correctness,—but this is only a negative praise. The reader is never deeply interested, and certainly he never carries away a novel impression. True, he never attempts what he fails to execute. The "Pleasures of Memory," "Italy," "On a Tear," "On a Voice which was lost," are the appropriate subjects he has chosen. And thus it is too with Crabbe and Campbell : each of them accomplishes what they endeavour ; they have been able to keep the adage in mind, aut nunquam tentes, aut perfices ; they have acquired a lesson which is very difficult to learn,—they have known the boundaries of their powers, and confined themselves to their appropriate tasks.

THE LIFE AND TIMES OF THE REV. JOHN CAMPBELL.*

THE office of historiographer to the Evangelical dissenters appear to have devolved upon Dr. Philip of Maberly Chapel. The present work, however,—which is in many respects a history of one memorable epoch in the annals of dissent,—unlike the memoirs of Bunyan and Whitefield, is almost an autobiography, to which Dr. Philip merely furnishes connecting links, and a kind of running commentary, which is sometimes critical, but more generally explanatory or eulogistic. The work bears some marks of haste; yet it will be a welcome gift to the flock and friends of the deceased pastor of Kingalund; as well as to many of the public at large. To the people of Scotland it possesses additional interest, from affording the first detailed account of the rise of the Independent congregational churches in Scotland, through the instrumentality of the brothers Haldane, Mr. John Aikman, and the subject of this memoir, namely, the “Philanthropic Ironmonger of the Grassmarket,” the itinerant lay preacher, the pastor of Kingalund congregation, and finally the missionary-general to South Africa, JOHN CAMPBELL.—His Times thus form an interesting record to many who may be indifferent about his Life.

Independently altogether of religious considerations, and viewing the labours of John Campbell and his more distinguished coadjutors, the Haldanes, Ewings, and Aikmans, merely in their moral and intellectual results, they were of vast importance to Scotland. These good men could not prosecute their great and ostensible object without illuminating the darkness, and warring with the vice which abounded among the torpid and neglected, or reckless, of the great substratum of the dense population of our larger towns; persons placed beyond the pale of respectable society, and belonging to no religious sect. It was impossible to inculcate Christian doctrine in any form among such out-lying members of civilized society without at the same time, in some degree, enlarging their knowledge, improving their manners, and laying the foundation of a purer succeeding generation. In this duty of “excavating the Heathen” of Scottish Christendom, the devoted band of itinerants, who started in Edinburgh above forty years since, held the place, in the northern end of the empire, of the Wesleyan Methodists in the South. Without committing ourselves to the approval of all they have either done or attempted to do, we are bound in candour to give the warmest praise to many of their objects, and unreserved commendation to many things accomplished for the good of the neglected poor of Scotland, which, save for their energetic and truly apostolic labours, and the impulse which these gave to both Churchmen and Seceders, might have been much longer delayed, if they had ever at all been thought of. To them, and eminently to the subject of this memoir, we owe, besides, the establishment of Sabbath schools, the circulation of cheap tracts, village lay-preaching, and missionary societies; the Magdalen Asylums of Edinburgh and Glasgow, and several other benevolent institutions. Of nearly all of these Mr. Campbell could, in old age, say, as he often did, “I had a finger in that pie too,”—or, “I had a hand in that too.” Indeed his personal history is chiefly valuable for showing how much blessing an humble individual, of average capacity, may confer on his fellow-creatures, if he is full of zeal and devotedness, and strenuous in endeavour, when, like Campbell, he finds his proper sphere of usefulness. In Scotland, but particularly in his native city of Edinburgh, John Campbell must still be affectionately remembered by many, who know that originally he possessed no influence from fortune or station, no great intellectual endowments nor educational acquirements; but that, filled with love to God and good-will to man, he possessed the happy knack of improving the single talent to the utmost. Not that, especially at the commencement of his career, he was without both faults and weaknesses, though they were of that inoffensive kind which rather excites mirth than provokes indignation. He seems to have possessed, by constitution, not a little self-complaisance, and to have been, in reality, on the best terms with himself, even when the most loudly bewailing his sins and shortcomings.

Not to speak it with irreverence, or with any desire to depreciate an individual whose claims to respect rest on the sure foundation of the good he has done, it strikes us, that in childhood, boyhood, youth and old age, John Campbell must have been exactly one of those canny, countrie, awd-farrand little beings peculiar to Scotland, and so exquisitely delineated by Galt,—one of his pawkie and gabby laddies, gifted with a rare mother-wit, and with a modest, but by no means scanty endowment of self-complaisance, and a vanity the farthest possible removed from arrogance or selfish egotism. Like Galt's Wheelies and Pawkies, John Campbell succeeded in all his undertakings, by sheer mother-wit; seldom damped by undue and awkward diffidence, or the consciousness of incapacity. Even in external circumstances, and in the outer man, he was assimilated to Galt's most unheroic heroes. He was a very small and a very dark man, bearing marks of the origin of the genuine Celt—

Sinewy, short, and spare,
And hardened to the blast.

To complete his resemblance to Galt's lucky humble adventurers, the Provost Pawkie, and Sir Andrew Wyllie, he was early left an orphan, and reared by a kind uncle and aunt with as much care and tenderness as Wheelie's pious grannie showed for her charge. There was, however, this great distinction: these heroes were merely worldly adventurers, ambitious, in their own way, of wealth and civic honours; and our hero's ambition had more exalted objects, and took a far nobler direction.

The good-natured vanity, which was a distinguishing trait in the character of Campbell, breaks out, and often very pleasantly, in the autobiography, written in old age, from which this volume is principally compiled. Perhaps vanity is not the true term for the bonhomie, or child-like simplicity, of those who, being on perfectly good terms with themselves, have no idea of failing of the sympathy of others in their complacent feelings; and which, instead of being a repelling or offensive personal quality, often becomes in these individuals peculiarly engaging—something for which they are the more beloved by their friends.

JOHN CAMPBELL was born in Edinburgh in March 1766. His father, a native of the beautiful and romantic village of Killin in Perthshire, became a thriving grocer in the Cowgate of Edinburgh, where he had the honour to entertain in his house the pastor of Killin parish, Mr. Stewart, (the first translator of the New Testament into the Gaelic language,) when the Minister attended the meetings of the General Assembly. Of three sons, John was the youngest. He lost his father when he was but two years of age, and his mother before he was six. Provident and trust-worthy guardians had been chosen for the orphans, and they were received into the family of their worthy uncle, Mr. Bowers,—sufficient property being left by their parents to afford them a good education. It was much more common in Edinburgh, sixty years since, than now, to give boys of all conditions, above the humblest, a classical education; and the brothers attended the High School; John having been for some time the school-fellow of Sir Walter Scott. The class-fellow he could scarcely be, as he was several years older than Scott. It is probable, as his classical attainments were never great, that he did not remain very long under the care of Burns' convivial friend, Willie Nicoll.

That he was the school-fellow of Scott is proved by a very characteristic letter written by him towards the close of his life, from which we copy an extract. It proves, among other things, that the common idea of Scott having been born and bred a Jacobite is completely erroneous; though he might have, in part, been driven into High Toryism and cavalier tastes by the Whiggish and Presbyterian strictness of his early education in his father's house. Campbell, after introducing himself to Scott, thus states his claims to do so:—

"1. I am an old schoolfellow of yours. I was in Nicoll's class at the same time that you were, at the High School. Though I have never seen you or your brother since leaving that initiatory seminary, yet, were I a painter of portraits, I am confident I could draw a correct likeness of you both.

"2. I sat under the invaluable ministry of Dr. Erskine, in the pew of George Grindlay, leather-merchant, West Bow, which was only a few seats from your father's pew, and saw you regularly attending there; and I can trace the effects of it in various of your publications, from the patness with which you quote many scripture phrases. When I meet with them, I say, 'There is the fruit of Dr. Erskine's labours!'

"3. I was intimate with relations of yours—the Miss Scotts, at one time resident at Lasswade, who used to lodge at our house, back of the Meadows, when they came to visit your father.

"4. I have had the pleasure of frequently conversing with your father, especially about the time that Tom Paine was poisoning the minds of our countrymen, in convincing them that they were miserable; a thing of which they were ignorant till he made the discovery to them. Hundreds of publications did your father purchase and send to different parts of the country, to convince the people that Tom Paine was in the wrong.

"But you ask, Pray who are you? I am John Campbell, of whom I dare say you have never heard. I have gone twice out to Southern Africa for a society here. The first time ascended up 1000 miles from the Cape of Good Hope; the second time, I went 1300; and have been twenty-four years minister of Kingsland Chapel, near London.

"I do not say, Forgive me for the length of the introduction; for it has surely taken me more trouble to write than you to read. Now, my dear sir, the object that I have in view in addressing you is your own and the public benefit. You have got prodigious talents, and also the ear of the public to an extent few have ever had. These talents, of course, you have from the God of heaven; and must know it, from the advantages you had in your youthful days. I think you might use them to better purposes than I have observed you to do. You might interweave with your publications more of the important truths of the gospel, of which you are not ignorant, and in a way likely to be useful.

"I trust that in the retirement and stillness of Abbotsford you think more seriously, my dear sir, than you make known to all the world. Your constant allusion to, or making use of scripture terms, has led me to hope so. You have got, sir, to the pinnacle of fame in this passing world; which I dare say you feel to be a poor thing, unable to cure either a head or a heart ache. I think, could you turn your fine talents more to the honour of God and the immortal interests of mankind, you would not only amuse but benefit the world.

"If my hints are considered intrusions, I hope you will forgive me on the score of good intentions. They cannot do you any harm. I stand up for you as a quondam school-fellow. Though I have been long from Auld Reekie, with all her faults, I love no place in the world with the same kind of affection. To come in sight of Arthur's Seat would make me leap a yard high at any time. I cannot tell you the reverence with which I looked to Blackford Hill, when last in Edinburgh, where I used, when a boy, on Saturday afternoons, to seek for birds' nests. Sir, you know well that you look to no spot in the world, 'with the same eyes,' as we say in the north, as where you spent your boyhood."

No answer seems to have been returned to this epistle. Perhaps none could have been expected; but Scott has given a burlesque account of Campbell, while the latter was an itinerant in the Orkney Islands, which appears in Lockhart's Life of Sir Walter, along with those other good stories which Mr. Lockhart has received as gospel in Scott's Journals, and published, sometimes with little advantage to his memory. Dr. Philip blames Scott alone for this "shot at the righteous," "this contemptible squib." The anecdote is humorous of its kind; descriptive of the state of manners at that time in Orkney, and no bad caricature likeness of the person described. The good-natured, pious "Pecht" lived to read it, and was not mortally offended,—though he appears to have been a little touchy on the score of stature; but he denies having been taken for a Pecht, black and long as his beard may have been. The story appears in the third volume of Scott's Life. It is so really good that, as Dr. Philip has seen fit to publish it, we need not be scrupulous in following his example:—

"There are remains of their Norwegian descent [viz. of the Orcadians, or Orkney Islanders] and language, in North Ronaldshaw, an isle I regret I did not see.

"A missionary preacher came ashore there a year or two since; but being a very little, black-bearded, unshaved man, the seniors of the isle suspected him of being an ancient Pecht or Pict, and 'no canny,' of course. The schoolmaster came down to entreat our worthy Mr. Stevenson, then about to leave the island, to come up and verify whether the preacher was an ancient Pecht, yea or no. Finding apologies in vain, he rode up to the house where the unfortunate preacher, after three nights' watching, had got to bed, little conceiving under what odious suspicion he had fallen. As Mr. Stevenson declined disturbing him, his boots were produced, which being a little—little—very little pair, confirmed, in the opinion of all the by-standers, the suspicion of Pechtism. Mr. Stevenson therefore found it necessary to go into the poor man's sleeping apartment, where he recognised one Campbell, heretofore an ironmonger in Edinburgh, but who had put his hand for some years to the missionary plough; of course, he warranted his quondam acquaintance to be no ancient Pecht. Mr. Stevenson carried the same schoolmaster, who figured in the adventure of the Pecht, to the mainland of Scotland, to be examined for his office."

Our prophet had at this period small honour from some individuals in his own country. Imputing his exceeding zeal to selfish motives, some said, "that had it not been for the Missionary Society he might have been selling nails all his days in the Grassmarket;" Dr. Philip remarks:—

Nothing but his preaching to prisoners and the poor gave offence; and that did shock some orderly Presbyterians not a little. One stickler for holy orders prayed so for his mouth to be stopped, that an apprentice could not resist laughter. The lad was turned off, for impiety. This grieved his parents and minister, who had a high opinion of him. They upbraided him for irreverence at family prayer, in his master's house. "How could I but laugh," he said, "when the master prayed every Sabbath morning, that a red hot poker might be stuck into Johnny Campbell's throat that day, if he presumed to minister in word or doctrine!"

We have anticipated the regular narrative. On the death of their parents, the orphan boys, as was mentioned, went to live with their uncle and aunt Bowers. Mr. Bowers was, we believe, a master stocking-weaver in the suburban locality still occupied by that craft,—the Sciennes, so named from the ancient convent that stood in that neighbourhood, dedicated to Our Lady of Sienna. Campbell's earliest reminiscences, which in old age he relates with engaging simplicity, are of exploratory excursions, made in childhood and boyhood from the Sciennes to places in the vicinity of the city. One of these, describing an old wedding custom of Scotland, we shall cite in his own language, as a specimen of the De Foe-ish style which made him so acceptable a writer for children:—

"My first long journey from home was to the village of Pennyauk, about eight miles distant. Such was the interest I took in it, that the night before I set off, I could sleep none, and every hour seemed to have no end. However, daylight at length came, which afforded me as much pleasure as the return of evening to the hardwrought labourer. With joy I jumped out of bed, awoke the female servant who was to be my companion in travel, and wondered at the number of things she had to do before she could start. The marriage of an acquaintance was the object of our journey, which was to be on foot. When everything was adjusted, we set off in charming spirits; and the loveliness of the morning increased them. Everything around as we proceeded was beheld with deep interest; appearing to my boyish eyes as novel as if I had been travelling among the hills and dales of the moon. When I beheld Pentland Hills at my side, which I had only seen from afar before, I leaped and clapped my hands with joy, thinking what wonderful things I should have to relate on my return to home.

"On passing through the village of Straiton, and seeing a straight road for two miles before me, with a black moor on both sides, I considered it a perilous part of our journey, and kept pretty close to the servant; for not another human being was to be seen. This was a position I had never been placed in before; and glad was I on reaching Auchindinny brigs, (or bridges,) where there were a few houses, and children at play in front of them, a lovely river, and many trees clad in lively green, which, after passing amidst dull black moors, appeared like a paradise; though fatigued, it exhilarated our animal spirits, yet I began to think Pennyauk was a very remote region; for to all my inquiries, whether it was near such a tree, which we saw at a distance, or such a hill, the answer was uniformly, No! which made me sometimes fall down upon the grass, expressing a doubt if there was such a place as the village of Pennyauk. At last, we came in sight of the church-steeple, behind a rising ground; intelligence as interesting to me then, as if now I were to come in sight of Jerusalem.

"Next day, the marriage took place somewhere at a distance; after which, the young couple, with numerous friends on horseback, came with great speed into the village, where almost the whole of the villagers were turned out to witness their public entrance. A barn had been cleared out for the company to dine in; temporary tables were erected, on which abundance of provisions were placed. Scotch broth, with the addition of raisins in it, I remember, was in great request, because raisins are not used except on such great occasions. When a plateful was handed to me, of course I first looked to see how many raisins were in it; and I believe that I was not the only one in the company who directed their attention to that point. When the dinner was finished, one and sixpence was collected from each person who had partaken of it; the profit from which was designed to assist the new pair to furnish their house, a common custom in the days of 'auld lang syne.' All who were willing to pay for the dinner were made most welcome to join the party. A dance commenced immediately after the removal of the dinner. A table, on which stood a large vessel like a tub full of whisky-punch, was placed at the end of the barn; the guardians of which were the parish minister, and three or four elderly relations of the married people. These supplied every dancer with a glass of punch when they chose to apply, whether male or female. The fiddler, also, was not forgotten. All was novelty to me, for it was the first and last penny, or paying, wedding that I ever witnessed; for they only even then took place in the country. It quite suited my boyish taste; for, like others, I was fond of stir and bustle. I was delighted with the village, which contained five or six hundred inhabitants, and surrounded with paper-mills and fine scenery. . . .

"I recollect nothing about leaving the place, and my return home; but I remember being proud, among my companions, of being such a traveller."

His next great journey must have been made ten years later. It was to Perth; and comprehended a tour through Fife to St. Andrews, and so back to Edinburgh. He was accompanied by one of his brothers. They set off in grand style, mounted on a couple of Galloways, careful friends having first estimated their expenses at thirty shillings each, besides horse hire—no trifling sum at the Sciennes in those days! This journey was no doubt a great event in a young life, but the next was greater still. It was a pedestrian excursion made to Killin in Breadalbane, by way of Stirling, to visit the birthplace of their father, and of all their paternal ancestors so far as these could be counted; and every Campbell has, or at all events then had, a tolerably long pedigree. Their spirits were high, and the mountain-dew was exhilarating; and in those days there was no Temperance Societies, nor yet much intemperance. The juvenile tourists proceeded briskly to Callander, now the frontier town of the Trosachs' scenery, with several handsome inns; but then a very poor place, having but one house of entertainment for wayfarers:—

"Little," says Mr. Campbell, "did I think then, that a schoolfellow of mine, Sir Walter Scott, was to effect such a change in that remote, little-known village; for the scenery of 'the Lady of the Lake' is in the immediate neighbourhood. When Buonaparte shut us out from the continent by a wall more difficult to climb over than the great wall of China, families in England, taking a journey, selected that lake to be their object; consequently, every day brought many of them to Callander, and soon a considerable inn was erected; so that when I visited it twenty years after my first visit, I found I could procure anything I could have obtained in the best inns in the south. They told me then, that often they had thirty families from different parts of England and Scotland, and sometimes foreigners, visiting Callander in one day. All this change was produced by the head and pen of Sir Walter Scott, who was a young unknown at my former visit; but now, when I write this, his lamp has gone out, and his dust is mingling with the dust of a thousand generations."

They were kindly welcomed by their relatives, and hospitably received in the manse of the venerable Mr. Stewart, the friend of their father. They viewed the graves of their ancestors; they ascended the lofty Ben-Lawers. They were delighted with all they saw, Dr. Philip relates:—

Mr. Campbell's father was born at the foot of the lofty Ben-Lawers, on the banks of Loch Tay; "one of the loveliest lakes," as he often said, "I ever saw; extending fifteen miles, and guarded on each side by a row of huge mountains, wooded to the very summit with beautiful trees. The margin of the lake is studded with small villages, which look across at each other; and the tops of the mountains can be seen even from the streets of Edinburgh, although eighty miles off." Mr. Campbell had this scene of his father-land before him wherever he travelled; and brought the mountains and valleys of Africa, as well as of Europe, alike into comparison with it. The villages along Loch Tay were his models when he selected sites, and drew plans for missionary settlements in Africa; for he filled his soul with the scene.

Mr. Campbell prattles very pleasantly of their homeward journey; which we pass to come at the Sabbath-evening usages of the worthy family in which he was domesticated—a household which made him never feel the want of a father's house. The whole family attended public worship in the Relief meeting-house, in what is now called College Street, in which Mr. Bain then officiated.

"Immediately after tea, the whole family were assembled in uncle's room, viz., we three brothers, the female servant, and an apprentice. Each was asked to tell the texts and what they remembered of the sermons they had heard during the day; then a third part of the questions in the Shorter Catechism were asked, to which we repeated the answers in rotation. He then took one of the questions as it came in course, from which, off hand, he asked us a number of questions, for the trial of our knowledge and informing our judgments. The service was concluded by singing two verses of a psalm, and uncle offering a most pious prayer for a blessing on the evening exercises. From the variety that we attended to, we did not weary in the service; indeed, I do not recollect one of us ever yawning during it. This way of keeping the Sabbath deeply impressed us with its sanctity. Had I heard a boy whistle, or a man laugh loud, or overheard the sound of an instrument of music from a house, I was actually shocked. We were never permitted to cross the threshold of the door on the Lord's day, except when going to worship. Some might conclude from all this that we must have been a gloomy, morose family, but the fact was the reverse. Uncle was a cheerful man, possessed peace of mind, and the prospect of a happy eternity!

"I remember an old disciple calling upon him a few days before his departure, when he got so animated that he was well heard in the next room. I remember he said, 'When I was a bachelor, and the men in the winter time used to come to the kitchen fire at twilight to warm themselves for half an hour before lighting candles, I used to retire to my room to hold a little intercourse with God; for twenty years I seized that half-hour's retirement with as much eagerness as ever a hungry man did his dish of victuals.' This seemed to have risen in his mind like Jacob's—'God met with me at Luz!'

"His intimate companions were truly the excellent of the earth, men of genuine piety, of prayer, and knowledge of the Scriptures, whose Society was a great privilege to us youngsters. These men I have heard in prayer wrestling with God for the downfall of anti-Christian superstition, Mohammedan delusions, and the destruction of heathen darkness. I have often thought since, how wonderful it was that it never occurred to such worthy men to ask—What can the Christian church do to effect these great ends?"

The next scene is full of character, and is exactly one of those which might be taken as almost a literal transcript from Galt:—

"Mrs. Bowers, Mr. Campbell's venerable aunt, used to tell with great delight the history of his first offer to take his turn at family worship. His brothers were both from home one night, and when the hour of prayer came, he modestly said, 'Aunt, if you have no objection, I will take the Book, and make prayers.' Aunt was delighted with the proposal, and went to the kitchen to tell the servant—an eminently pious woman, who had been long in the family, and was very fond of John. But the good news was too much for the worthy domestic. She wept and laughed at the same time, saying, 'Eh, sirs, I winna bekeace myself at worship; and that will be well seen. I'm so pleased, that I am sure to laugh out; and yet I canna absent myself.' Aunt said, 'For shame! I'll ding laughing out of ye, if ye dinna behave yourself. The lad must no' be put out by your weakness.' This set all right, and he got well through the exercise. At this time Mr. Campbell was an apprentice to a goldsmith and jeweller in Edinburgh; and in this situation he acted out his principles. One part of his conduct is worthy of record. The players had borrowed from his master some jewel for a special purpose, and he was sent to the theatre to bring it home, when the play was over. He had never been in a theatre before; but he was so shocked by the levity and impiety he witnessed, that he resolved to pay for the trinket, if it was not returned next morning, rather than spend the evening in such a place. He found on calculating its value, that he could afford its price, by submitting to some privations; and accordingly he left the theatre, and went to family worship. He was no loser. The trinket was forthcoming next morning; and thus both his pocket and conscience were saved. He never entered a theatre again."

Both his brothers died of decline in early life, and within a short time of each other, and John gave up his own trade of a goldsmith to carry on the business of his deceased brother Alexander, who had been an ironmonger. "The Philanthropic Ironmonger of the Grassmarket" soon became a character of some note.

Campbell's spiritual fathers do not seem to have been ministers, though he had duly attended the ministrations of Dr. Erskine, the then famous Dr. Colquhoun of Leith, and others of high evangelical repute. One of his earliest pious counsellors was a Cambuslang convert, named Duncan Clark; a retired exciseman, living at Stirling, who sometimes visited Edinburgh, and who was commonly designated "The Praying Gauger." He was a very pious and primitive person; and a man of some learning. He was the son of a clergyman; and his sole employment, in the latter part of his life, seems to have been travelling from place to place to attend sacraments.

They often conversed together until it was so late, or rather so early, that Mrs. Bowers was obliged to leave short candles upon the table. But even this precaution did not always send them to bed in proper time. Duncan Clark's maxim was, "I know not which world I shall wake in, and therefore I wish to be ready for both." His walking to save money for benevolent purposes, was another maxim which Mr. Campbell acted upon rigidly, whilst able to walk; and he had well-nigh imitated him in remaining a bachelor; but Mr. Newton's advice, and his own good sense, taught him "a more excellent way" than Duncan's, although not soon.

Another spiritual guide, who possessed even greater fervour and unction, is thus described by Dr. Philip:—

Another remarkable character, whose proverbial sayings were "more precious than gold" to Mr. Campbell, was a schoolmaster in the Highlands, named Dugald Buchanan. They never saw each other: but some of Dugald's old friends became Mr. Campbell's early friends, and brought the spell of the seraphic Celt upon his spirit, by quoting Kinloch-Rannach oracles. I have always ascribed his keen sense of the graphic and glowing sublimity of the Scriptures to Dugald Buchanan, rather than to Dr. Blair or Bishop Lowth. He knew their works well, but he knew the following criticisms long before. A gentleman invited Dugald to see a fine painting by one of the old masters. After examining it, Dugald invited the gentleman to see a much finer one in his cottage. The invitation was accepted; for no one could suspect Dugald of pretence or trifling, he was so modest as well as shrewd. Accordingly he took down his Bible, and placed before the Laird that Apocalyptic vision,—“The angel which I saw stand upon the sea, and upon the earth, lifted up his hand to heaven, and swore by Him that liveth for ever and ever, that time should be no more.” “Could anything be more sublime!” Mr. Campbell was wont to ask with triumph.

Dugald spent a winter in Edinburgh once, whilst the Gaelic Scriptures were printing under his superintendence. Then he saw Shakspeare for the first time, and attended lectures in the University. A distinguished critic quoted to him the passage—

The cloud-capt towers, the gorgeous palaces,
The solemn temples, the great globe itself,
Shall dissolve, &c. &c.—

and asked “if there was anything to equal that!” “Yes,” said Dugald, “I have an old Book at home, which contains a sublime passage on the same subject. It runs thus, ‘I saw a great white throne, and Him that sat on it, from whose face the earth and the heavens fled away, and there was no place found for them,’” Rev. xviii. “Why, sir,” said the critic, “that is in the Bible: but I must confess that I never saw its sublimity before.”

These are not traditional reports of Dugald. The late venerable Dr. Erskine, of Edinburgh, wrote a sketch of his character, in the preface to a work on the death of children; and I have seen a letter of the Doctor's, in which he said of one of my own teachers, John Leslie, of Huntley, “I have found no such man, since Dugald Buchanan died.” This pours a flood of light, to me, upon his character, which enables me to shed some light upon the influence which the study of it had upon Mr. Campbell's habits of thinking, and especially upon his tact in seizing on and showing the beauties of the Scriptural language, as well as in illustrating them from the scenery and customs of Africa. His little work entitled “African Light,” teems with specimens of the cast which Dugald's sayings gave to his mind; for although he had none of the Celt's mystic sublimity in his temperament, he had a quick eye, and a keen relish, for whatever was beautiful, ingenious, or remarkable, as that work abundantly proves.

John Campbell had always had habits of religion; and the growth of his religious opinions and principles, is traced from his diaries and early correspondence, probably with greater minuteness than some of his friends may deem altogether for edification. But it is always desirable to see the whole truth of a character, or of a state of mind. We cannot perceive that Campbell was so great a sinner as his own vanity, or love of making a figure, represents him; but there was both conceit, of a bad kind, and gross self-delusion about him, when he judged of the state of his neighbour publicans and sinners in the adjoining shops in the Grassmarket, and compared it with his own. Of his complaints of the hardness of his heart, and the weakness of his faith, and much more of the same sort, Dr. Philip pertinently remarks:—

Mr. Campbell's heart would not have put forth all this hardness, had he not been trying to make it very good. Had he let it alone, or not challenged it by law and gospel, to be pure and spiritual, it would have been as good a heart as that of any man who is well pleased with himself.

It was, according to the biographer, not till ten years afterwards, that Campbell “knew the truth so as to be made free by it.” Yet in this interval

His letters and diaries show an amount of prayer, meditation, and self-communing, as well as of Scriptural reading, to which it would not be easy to find a parallel in the privacy of any tradesman, since the times of the Commonwealth. He was also highly esteemed by many eminent Christians, and held the place of clerk in the session of Mr. Baines's church, and was beloved by the sick and dying poor, as a visitor, whilst, like Job, he “abhorred,” and, like Ephraim, “bemoaned himself.” In fact, he stood low with none, but with the more sedate of his young companions; and even with them, only when his levity at the tea or supper-table went beyond ordinary bounds.

Among other means of growth in grace, he entered into a frequent correspondence with Mr. Ritchie, another very serious young man, also residing in Edinburgh. They appear to have been of different temperaments; and each watched over his own mental sensations and varying moods, and minutely detailed them to the other as spiritual “experiences.” Duncan Clark did not quite approve of this correspondence, which was indeed excellently adapted to foster the besetting sin of his pupil. He thought “prayer and repentance” a better exercise than this letter-writing. A single specimen of the correspondence amply confirms his opinion. After expressing great doubts of his real state; and lamenting his deadness, and dullness, and hardness of heart, our young saint, who was seldom on really bad terms with himself, remarks:—

"Yet I cannot help telling you, that I had much sweetness all the afternoon I spent with (Dr.) Colquhoun. I was filled with wonder that the great God who upheld and governed the stars should look into my heart, perhaps to dwell, in some little degree, in such a sinful, trifling creature as myself. All the people in the shops around me are better looking than I am, yet have no experience of the condescending love of God! Were a man to choose in the shop, I should be the last he would take. Such condescension is a mystery to be solved only in heaven. But to stop here. I am just thinking that there will be no drowsy heads there, and no need of pen, ink, and paper.—I am yours in the —"

There was much to be amended here, that Dr. Philip does not seem to take account of; nor can we imagine with what object he has published such passages as the above, unaccompanied by a more sifting exposure, and by grave warning and rebuke. Here is another sample:—

The grace which shines in the truth was "no grace" to Mr. Campbell, except when it warmed, melted, and amazed him, as distinguishing grace to himself at the moment. Mr. Ritchie was more cautious, and sometimes "afraid to say of a sweet experience that it was from the Lord." Once, when he could not resist the conviction that the Lord had visited his soul, he related the manifestation with great modesty, and some hesitation. Not so did Mr. Campbell treat the matter. His friend's exercise had been ecstatic and entrancing; and he said, "I am glad you were obliged to acknowledge that exercise to have been from the Lord. This was but your reasonable service, in such a rebellious district of creation. John, I think your experience surpasses many." Mr. Campbell himself had had something of the kind at the same time; he therefore added, "O dear, it is a noble thing to have much love when we are young. The Lord says, he will not forget it. Now, John, if you and I be in Christ, there are two empty seats in heaven, which will stand empty till our earthly tabernacle be dissolved. Perhaps angels give place as the saints enter. If the promise of my stay in heaven was, till we could tell all the value and glory of Christ, it would not discourage me. It will take eternity to do that! 'Deed, John, the Lord is dandling you and me in his kind arms now; but, depend on it, we shall have to walk on the causeway yet." This is not the first time I have trembled to think of the dark days which are coming."

Campbell, after being greatly cast down, got into a happier frame, and wrote a letter to his more cautious friend, the other John, which enraptured him. He wrote in reply:—

"It is well your part to exalt, praise, and adore your loving Lord and Father. Go on, too, ye angels and saints, in your delightful employment. O that my soul were drawn out in a song! Why sigh again! It pleased me well to read your arguings with yourself. Unbelief is not only a great sin, but also a mother-sin, and a strangely infatuating evil. I must confess I feel a great affection to you. My heart is united to you in a bond of love, which death cannot break. O, dianna forget my poor soul! We must watch against unbelief. One day, whilst I was a boy, my mother heard me weeping in my room at prayer. She asked me, why? I said, 'The Lord will not give me a new heart.' She answered, 'Dianna fear that: turn to Ezek. xxxvi.' 'Ay, but,' said I, 'it is no said there, that He will give it to Jock Ritchie.'"

The extreme caution, or want of faith, of "Jock Ritchie" will, to many, seem ludicrous. It does not seem so to Dr. Philip. It is, at least, highly characteristic. Had not Mr. Campbell become eventually "a sober-minded, cheerful, and happy believer," there would have been great indiscretion in displaying to the world his many fantastic humours.

At one time he was rapt into the third heavens; and at another, overwhelmed with black despair, yet always with a reserve, as Newton seems to have remarked. Those consequences of an unmitigated theology, or of a very faulty religious education, which have driven many unfortunate persons into actual phrenzy, are strikingly revealed in what follows. He was now in manhood, and had just returned from attending his dying brother into the country:—

He durst not approach the sacramental table; "evidences being all out of sight, and grace out of exercise."

He had been haunted in boyhood by a suspicion that, as he had two brothers, God would not save all three; or that one would be left, and himself be the victim of Satan. His first reading of Doddridge also, had thrown him into terrors which suggested "unutterable blasphemies." These, again, had made him so reckless of eternal ruin, that he had wished himself a devil, and given up both prayer and hope. It was these horrors and extravagances he sat down to review and record, when he came home; and, as might be expected, they aggravated his distress. His friend also, to whom he wrote all this, was just the reverse of it all at the time. His rapture was as high as Mr. Campbell's spirits were low. Whilst the latter hung his harp upon the willows, the former tuned his to the highest of "Erskine's Gospel Sonnets." One of the fearful crises which Mr. Campbell reviewed at this time was enough, even as a recollection, to overwhelm him, prone as he was to despair. It was this: "My agony," he says, "like the flood of Noah, grew greater and greater. I drank deep of the cup of law-terror. I was without the smallest degree of hope. I was almost certain I could not live long. I thought I was dropping into hell. I was just amazed, that people in such a critical situation were so little concerned. I had awfully realizing views of the miserable state of the lost. I was often putting my finger into the fire, to feel something of the torment I had to endure. It terrified me so much, that it was a wonderful providence my judgment was preserved, and that I was kept from laying hands on myself. But an over-ruling hand prevented all this. He delivered me from the paw of the lion and the bear."

While in his ecstatic moods, he sometimes fancied that he had a call to the ministry. He had long tried to be useful in a private way, but now he meditated "public service," to "be useful to the souls of his brethren." He already paid great attention to the sick and dying; and he began to find safety for himself in striving to do good to others. With one wholesome and excellent remark, Dr. Philip concludes the account of the soul exercises of these seraphic correspondents:—

There can be no doubt that, had he done nothing but pore and ponder over his own feelings, he must have sunk in mind or character. There is no such security against undue depression as great activity in doing good to others; for it places one under the wing of a special Providence, as well as diverts the mind from preying on itself.

About this period, or shortly afterwards, Mr. Campbell being in London, introduced himself to the Rev. John Newton of Woolnoth, and commenced a correspondence which had the happiest effects on his mind and prospects; and which helped to withdraw him from fantasies by directing his fervent spirit to objects of practical and active benevolence. Newton became his model and his oracle. His example even made him for a time, from a Dissenter, almost a Churchman in his predilections; and in what we now hear represented as the worst and dearest times of Moderatism, we find him saying :

"Many things may be found in the Kirk, which she could well want; but I believe that the Lord has not altogether forsaken her. In some measure, He dwells in her; and as many are 'born again' in her bounds, as in any of similar dimensions. Now, you will not wonder when I tell you, that I have not yet seen cause to withdraw from our Establishment totally. When the Lord's presence is gone,—if I know of this,—I will go too. But my soul knows right well, that this is far from being the case yet."

He was drawn closer to Newton by their common apprehension of the consequences of the heresies of Macgill of Ayr: those heresies afterwards recanted and pardoned. On this subject, it is remarked by our Voluntary, that he had not any taste for religious persecution; but that he despised the meanness of writing against the cardinal Articles of the Kirk, and yet eating her bread and wearing her honours. It is this meanness which embarrasses national churches. Voluntary churches can rid themselves of such rogues without any appeal to civil or ecclesiastical law; but State Churches must either bring a heretic before their Courts, or wink at his heterodoxy; for in them, it is a breach of legal covenant. Hence, at this time, the Church of England is in a dilemma, by the Oxford Tracts. Any mitre, or chair, that would avow their real principles and spirit, would be as legally forfeited as the crown was by James at the Revolution; for these tracts are as faithless to Protestantism, as the last of the Stuarts was to his Coronation oath. I refer to this question, because the protesters against Puseyism now, are just doing what Mr. Campbell did against Socinianism,—the only thing they can do, if they would not wink at insults to the Articles and Homilies of their Church, nor at defiance to the law; for Puseyism, however sleek, is both.

Campbell, however, was zealous against Dr. Macgill to a pitch which looked very like the disposition to persecute. The slackness and tergiversation of the General Assembly about this time disgusted him with Church Courts, and laid the foundation of his subsequent independency. Ecclesiastical corporations were as obnoxious to Newton.

The Catholic spirit and practical sound sense of Newton is apparent, in many instances, in this volume. In speaking of Dr. Stuart, his friend and Campbell's, who, it may be known, gave up his church at Cramond, on some question of Church government, and became first an Independent, and then a Baptist, and afterwards quarrelled with the Baptists, Newton remarks:—

"I am surprised that my friend, Dr. Stuart's peculiarities should have made such an impression upon you. You know the genius of the gospel, and that the kingdom of God does not consist in meats, drinks, or external punctilios. The doctor might have been a star of the first magnitude, if he could have kept his station at Cramond. What a pity that such a light should be shut up under a bushel; and that one who had tasted the kernel should waste so much of his time about the shell! He is still a good man, but he has shrunk the sphere of his usefulness, comparatively, to the size of a button. I trust that henceforth you will be shot-proof against all he can say on his favourite but dry subject. It seems he charges us who differ from him, with acting against our consciences. Is he then absolutely infallible? Pope Self will not say so much; but he acts as if he thought so. We may think Utopia a pleasant spot; but until we find it, we must be content to make the best of men and things as they are."

Dr. Philip extends these remarks to the Ital-danes.—Upon one occasion, Newton and his young friend Campbell were discussing the general question of Episcopacy. It is but a left-handed compliment which the former, in his defence, pays to prelacy; nor would it hold now when the inferior clergy are often annoyed and even persecuted by their spiritual superiors.

"I can assure you," he wrote, "that however strange some may think it, I am glad, and have much cause to be thankful, that I am what and where I am. I think, with respect to man, we are properly the Independents. The bishops in England interfere with us no more than the bishops in Italy, except in requiring us to appear and answer to our names, once in three or four years." "No questions are asked, nor any fault found, by our superiors." Letts. A. D. 1795. A queer compliment to the bench,—Mr. Campbell thought. Mr. Newton added, with more discrimination, "I am not very fond of either assemblies, synods, benches, or boards. Ministers are like flowers, which will preserve their colour and scent much longer, if kept singly, than when packed together in a nosegay or posy. Then they quickly fade and corrupt. Their associations, in my judgment, should always be voluntary and free."

Here Newton only turned the poetry of his friend Cowper into prose. Campbell's next alarm was for the emancipation of the Catholics; and he seems to have shared in the Protestant panic of Lord George Gordon and his fanatical or ruffianly mobs, and to have taken an active part. Mr. Newton showed him his error here; and when he wrote to the same sober-minded and mature Christian in the flaming spirit of non-intrusion, the prudent and peaceful churchman replied,—

"I have no skill on the subject of Scotch patronages. I suppose they are what is called legal, or they could not take place. But some things deemed right in law there will be, which are not quite consistent with equity. I believe there are as few in our nation as in any."

But Campbell here held by his own opinion, and remained connected with the Relief Church until he became an openly professed Independent. Dr. Philip mentions his liberal opinions in politics; but he was never a great politician, though a personal and intimate connexion which he and some of his religious friends had with Watt—a man of equivocal character, who became the spy of the government, and who was afterwards caught in his own snares, and tried and executed in Edinburgh for high treason, brought him into proximity with the so-called Jacobins. Watt had, among his other professions, been a flaming professor of religion. Dr. Philip does not mention the circumstance, and was probably not aware of it.

Before Mr. Campbell became actively engaged in Missionary projects, and indeed before these were organized in this country, he maintained correspondences which made him familiar with the leading events in the religious world of distant countries, and with all the revivals of the period; and had, in his own words, "a finger in every pie." He enjoyed the friendship of many of the more eminent ministers of the time, and was honoured to be the almoner and correspondent of the pious and aged Countess of Leven, for whom he collected religious intelligence, or gossip. Extracts are given from the correspondence which are creditable to both parties; though the reader is never permitted to forget, that between Christians of humble and of high station, there is a vast dividing gulf; at least as respects this world. And now, in 1795, after our "philanthropic ironmonger" had for ten years maintained the character of "a lively Christian," he was first, and finally, and suddenly, converted, and found peace. He tells his correspondent, the Countess of Leven, that on the night of the 25th January he had such a sight of God's grace as he cannot describe. He says,—

Since I last wrote, the Lord hath appeared very wonderfully on my behalf. And what makes it the more marvellous, He came unsought, and told me that, notwithstanding all my horrid iniquity, I was redeemed by the blood of Christ! After me none need despair of pardoning mercy. I had long had the honour of being thought a lively Christian; but, ah, I felt little of the power! Such a sight as God gave me of his grace, on Tuesday, January 27th, 1795, I can scarcely describe.

He hinted something of the same sort to Mr. Newton, and received this gentle admonition,—
"Such views have not been a part of my experience; though, I hope, I likewise rest upon the simple truth; but it is as it lies in the Book."

He afterwards detailed at much length and with great fervour, his whole spiritual condition; not without having seen, we should imagine, the very remarkable revelations of Cowper, during a similar period of fiery trial and deliverance. This letter, which was signed Heman, Mr. Newton sent to the Evangelical Magazine, as he had probably been requested, but without note or commentary. Indeed, he remarks, rather cuttingly,—

"It seems that your correspondence with me was maintained through the whole of your low and uncomfortable state, and yet I do not recollect any remarkable hints of your despondency. On the contrary, you still supplied me with anecdotes."

Soon after this period he originated the Religious Tract Society, the first of the kind known in Great Britain. Dr. Philip does not seem aware that he was long a considerable dealer in books; and that he was at one time a regular bookseller, the firm being CAMPBELL & WALLACE—probably the first "religious publishers" in Edinburgh. About this time the Haldanes were first heard of, and Mr. Simeon of Cambridge visited Scotland. While he and Captain Haldane made a preaching tour, they also disseminated Tracts.

The idea of village preaching seems also to have originated with Campbell; and when he projected Sabbath Schools in the villages, it was, in fact, as he almost lets out, to pave the way for preaching. We must here venture on a long extract, for it refers to an eventful crisis. There were already several Sabbath schools in or near Edinburgh; and Mr. Campbell commenced one in the old Archer's-Hall, and then another in a room of the Dispensary in Richmond Street, procured for him by Dr. Stuart. He engaged proper teachers for these schools. That of the Archer's-Hall was, he says, much wanted in the district.

A merry-andrew of a preacher occupied the pulpit of the parish-chapel. He knew no more of the Gospel than of the hills in the moon. He was the gayest man I ever knew; but the most wretched in his own mind, when not in company.

This is not over-charitable to poor old Dr. John

Touch; but it must pass. Nor could he have been so constantly wretched; he had his violin. Campbell continues,—

"By and by, while musing on those matters, I said to myself, 'As yet you have only been working by deputation; is there nothing you could do yourself?' This question led me to think of a populous colliery village about five miles south of Edinburgh, in a most destitute situation, having only one place of worship, a Cameronian meeting, where there was a sermon about twice a year. It being about a mile to the left of the great road, and not seen from it, its existence was known only as a place from whence coals came to Edinburgh. It was about four miles from the nearest Gospel minister. I knew only two persons in the village, who were both worthy,—Norman Sadler and John Foulter. To these I wrote, offering to teach a Sabbath-evening school there, provided they could obtain the use of the Cameronian meeting-house, and collect a sufficient number of children. Soon their list of scholars, from eight years of age to twenty, amounted to about 200, who promised their attendance whenever the school should be opened.

"The use of the Cameronian meeting-house being obtained, a Sabbath-evening was fixed for the opening of the school. Mr. J. A. Haldane rode out with me to witness its commencement. The place was crowded with young people and their parents. I began by making a distinct profession of the doctrines which I believed, and designed to teach unto their children. This I thought, they had a right to expect from me; and I am sure I acted honestly, not concealing anything from them. I then addressed the young people, many of whom I was glad to see were above fourteen years of age. I then pointed out the tasks they were to commit to memory against next Lord's-day evening, from the Scriptures, Shorter Catechism, and metre Psalms of David. Mr. Haldane had not the courage to address a few words to the assembly, though I have many a time afterwards heard him address three thousand people with perfect ease; but these were the days of small things: orators, except in pulpits, were very rare. At that time I had never heard a layman speak at a public meeting in my life; indeed, such meetings as are now as common as the rising sun did not exist in those times. The late Mr. Aikman, of Edinburgh, rode out with me the second night, when we were delighted to see the house as full as it had been at the opening. After I had finished the catechising the young people, I asked Mr. Aikman to address them, (who was at that time studying under the Professor of Divinity in the College of Edinburgh,) who, though one of the most diffident of men, was prevailed upon to do it for about ten minutes. It was his maiden speech, and a charming speech it was. That he was able to speak in public for ten minutes put him in as high spirits during our ride home, as we may suppose Peter was on the evening after his pentecostal sermon, which added three thousand souls to the kingdom of God. Oh, how many precious addresses and sermons proceeded from the silken or silver lips of that man of God during the following forty years.

"I soon obtained an excellent colleague to take turn about with me in teaching the Loanhead school, Mr. John Cleghorn, then a Burgher-seceder student of Divinity, who thus took the half of the labour for the whole of the first year. He afterwards laboured for many years over a large Independent congregation in Wick.

"Loanhead school I continued to teach for two years every Sabbath evening, after Mr. C. left me; and was encouraged by hearing, now and then, of some good being done, but nothing remarkable.

"Example has a powerful influence on others. Loanhead school being a novelty at that time, and in that part of the country, it attracted a good deal of attention, and many began to desire that something similar might be planted in their own vicinities. The first that commenced a similar school was a village about two miles off,—I think its name was Bonnyriggs (or beautiful ridges of corn.) Mr. Alexander Pitcairn, insurance-broker—

Edinburgh, a most respectable Christian, volunteered to become the teacher. I visited it soon after its erection, and gave an address to the children, after Mr. Pitcairn had finished his catechising.

"Another school was instituted in Dalkeith, about four miles distant from Loanhead, which I attended at the opening, in the Relief Meeting, when about four or five hundred young people were present; also one in the parish church of Pennycuik, about four miles in the opposite direction; and one in a village near it, which was taught in the Dissenting chapel."

In all these operations he had both counsel and encouragement from the venerable Countess of Leven, and indeed, assistance from all the Balgownie family, as well as from others of the Scottish nobility. His reports of the schools in his almost weekly letters to her ladyship, not only drew from her bursts of gratitude to God, and of holy anticipation of good to man, but also brought clearly before himself the efficiency of the system, and of his own adaptation to the work.

"Thus, while these valuable school institutions were planted and increasing in and around Edinburgh," he says, "nothing of the kind existed anywhere else throughout Scotland, so far as we knew. The thought of this fact led Mr. J. A. Haldane and myself to undertake a journey for a week, to promote the school cause, by way of experiment, and to see how much good might be effected in a week. We set off on a Monday morning, taking some thousand tracts with us, in a one-horse chaise, distributing tracts to rich and poor as we proceeded. We obtained a meeting in Glasgow from a few friends of the cause of God, who were recommended to us as active and zealous.

"We also called on ministers of different denominations in the towns through which we passed, and conversed with them on the subject of Sabbath schools; all of whom, I think, approved the plan. . . . We arrived at home on Saturday evening. In three months afterwards we heard that the result of this one week's exertion was the formation of sixty Sabbath-evening schools!"

To us it appears that Mr. Campbell had long had an itch for preaching; though Dr. Philip states he was forced by circumstances to begin to preach before he gave up business. His first appearance as a preacher arose in this manner. The Haldanes wished him to go out as a Missionary to the East Indies; their great object at this early stage having been to spread the Gospel in India. Mr. Newton and the Countess of Leven both opposed this plan. Newton wrote:

"I believe there is not a gentleman in Scotland more desirous of promoting the salvation of the Hindoos than Mr. Wilberforce and Mr. Grant; the latter has resided long in Bengal, and he thinks that if Mr. Haldane was now there, he would find many things very different from his expectations.

"After all, I apprehend, that if the consent of the Company is a sine quâ non, Mr. Haldane will not go himself very soon. But my heart goes a pit-a-pat when I think of the possible consequences of attempting to make such a general stir throughout the nation. . . .

"I shall not be sorry if the Lord provide you with a good wife. This would strengthen my hope of keeping you at home, where, I am persuaded your proper business lies."

Mr. Haldane was much disappointed. He fancied that Bengal was the field for Campbell, and that in Edinburgh he could be dispensed with, as there were others there who could well fill his place. This set Campbell upon devising the scheme of Village Preaching, detailed in a letter never sent, and only opened forty-four years after date by Dr. Philip, while arranging the papers which had been committed to him.

It runs thus:—"The conversation I had with you on Saturday evening, together with the example of Mr. Clarkson, hath roused me to press through difficulties and inconveniences, that the name of Jesus may be known to the villagers contiguous to Edinburgh. Lase-wade seems the best place to begin with. The minister, from all accounts, is not a labourer, but a loiterer; and the people nowise dissatisfied with scraps from Seneca and Shakspeare. In order that they may not be alarmed at a man preaching in a coloured coat, I wish to begin with a Sabbath-evening school, and after instructing the children, to sound the Gospel to the aged. I am as sure that I shall fail if God be not with me as that I breathe. But if I fail, I shall blame my own unbelief, and cheerfully bear the stigma. I have also a strong desire to besiege Roslin next, in the strawberry season, when hundreds visit there. It is impossible to say what may be the result of such attempts if you and my other friends will back me. I wish your brother to be one of a village board, and to consult with you and Mr. Ewing. I know that I shall be called imprudent, assuming, self-righteous, by my cool brethren; but I am disposed to submit to this reproach if there be any prospect of doing good. I write, because I have not leisure to run over to your house." But he found leisure, and thus threw aside the letter.

From a village preacher to the regular ministry was but a step; and Newton, who probably perceived what must be, did not offer opposition. He remarks,—

"I am no advocate for self-sent preachers at large; but when men whose character and abilities are approved by competent judges; whose motives are known to be pure, and whose labours are excited by the exigency of the occasion, lay themselves out to instruct the ignorant and rouse the careless; I think they deserve thanks and encouragement, instead of reprehension, if they step a little over the bounds of church order. If I had lived in Scotland, my ministry, I suppose, would have been in the Kirk, or the Relief, or the Secession; and if Dr. Erskine had been born and bred among us, and regarded according to his merit, he might perhaps have been Archbishop of Canterbury long ago. Much of our differences of opinion on this head may, perhaps, be ascribed to the air we breathed and the milk we drank in infancy. Thus I have given you my free opinion upon your last point. I leave others to dispute whether the husk or the shell of the nut be the better of the two. I hope to be content with the kernel.

"But whilst you have a secular calling, it is your duty to be active and accurate in it. Self likes to be employed in great matters—grace teaches us to do small and common things in a great spirit. When you are engaged in business in a right frame of mind, you are as less serving the Lord than when you are praying, exhorting, or hearing."

But Newton rejoiced to hear of the zeal of the Messrs. Haldane and Aikman, and to receive good accounts of their preaching tours, suggestively remarking,—

Why should not the Orkney and the Highland Islands deserve attention as much as the islands of the South Sea? I hope gospel-zeal will, in due time, sail northwards to Shetland, and westward to St. Kilda, and all the intermediate islands."

Of this Dr. Philip says, in one of the most characteristic Voluntary passages in the biography:

He might well write in this way then of Mr. Campbell and his friends. They had the same divine commission—necessity of circumstances—for "preaching the word everywhere," as the laymen of the church in Jerusalem, when persecution drove them into Samaria, Acts viii. 4; besides ministerial qualifications, which neither presbyter nor bishop could confer; aptness to teach, and hearts burning with love to the souls of men, and characters "Man-less" enough for bishops of the apostolic age. And, without this apostolicity of spirit, what is any ecclesiastical right to minister in holy things, but an unholy perversion of ordaining power! Oh, when will the Church understand that apostolic succession is the line of apostolic faith and holiness! Any other line cannot be too much deprecated, nor too soon broken; for it is a line of moral "confusion," whatever ecclesiastical order it may secure. Order is, however, both a good and necessary thing. The want of it swamp the Haldanian enterprise in Scotland. Rash experiments, and raw preachers, and trifling disputes turned into a bye-word a design which would have "turned the world upside down," had it been as wisely conducted as it was nobly, generously, and prayerfully undertaken.

Mr. Campbell, by this time, having made up his mind, like a prudent young lady already engaged or resolved to marry, next consulted his friends. Among their number, were Scott the commentator on the Bible, Booth, Fuller of Kettering, Charles of Bala, the celebrated Welsh revivalist, Dr. Erskine, Rowland Hill, and Claudius Buchanan. He subsequently became the pupil of the Rev. Greville Ewing, an Edinburgh clergyman, who had left the Church to join the Haldanes, and who settled in Glasgow as the pastor of an Independent congregation, and as teacher of Theology to the students who adhered to the new sect. Campbell, from his previous studies, and his habits from his youth upwards, was already, according to his biographer, no mean theologian. His paternal friend, Newton, instead of urging study, rather cautioned him against what he called studying himself out of simplicity, and into a dry and technical manner of preaching; and he appears to have learned to preach by dint of preaching. But whatever were the amount or value of his formal studies, he ultimately possessed many of the highest qualifications of a useful preacher, if, which we do not doubt, the praise bestowed here is fully merited.

Whether native or acquired, his tact and taste were of a superior order, so far as the oracles of God were concerned; for his brethren never discovered any strong traces of learning in his conversation or preaching, they never discovered any marks of ignorance, or of inattention to "the mind of the Spirit." Altogether, however, his attention to learning, although it qualified him for the work of the ministry, would have done little for a man of ordinary genius, piety, or experience. A young man who has not the ingenuity and vivacity of John Campbell, as well as his spirituality, could never be the writer or preacher he became, by studying only, as he did at Glasgow. . . . Indeed, my only astonishment is, that he found time or composure to acquire the knowledge, which I knew him to possess; for, during all the time he was at Glasgow, he was absorbed with the cause of Home and Foreign Missions, and keeping up his extensive correspondence, as well as preaching or teaching almost every day.

Mr. Campbell had a reason for making all his studies bear upon preaching, which none of his Scotch friends knew at this time. His heart was in London, as the sphere where he could find his element, and as a centre from which he could itinerate with effect; and some friends at Kingsland Chapel had set their hearts upon bringing him there. This led him to study most what would fit him best for such a place. At the close of 1799, Thomas Reyner, Esq., had written to him thus:—"We have been expecting and waiting for a minister to watch over us. Several have been proposed, but our way has never been clear hitherto. We are now of one heart and mind, and believe that the Lord has work for you here. We therefore say, 'Come and help us, and may the Spirit and presence of the Lord come with you.'

It was thus for a suburban village, then but small and poor, that Mr. Campbell studied; and therefore general knowledge was his chief pursuit, because itineracy was his chief object; and Kingsland a post which he could leave in summer.

This is not quite consistent with a subsequent passage, nor with Mr. Campbell's own statements. In several visits to London he had been introduced to many of the leading persons in the religious circles, which are generally in full activity in the month of May, when public meetings are held, and the influx of visitors causes a prodigious stir. Dr. Philip forgetting that he had previously said Campbell's "heart was in London, as the sphere where he would find his element," gives a detailed account of his journey to the metropolis in the spring of 1802, after the termination of Dr. Ewing's lectures in Glasgow. This journey he converted into a preaching tour; and his biographer, after telling that he preached at most places on the road, remarks:

We have now followed Mr. Campbell far enough in his English itineracy to ask the question—Had he any ultimate design in thus making his way into so many pulpits, and in forming so many ministerial friendships? Now whatever design any one in London had upon him, he certainly had none upon it then. Whilst preaching almost every day in and around the metropolis, he was solemnly pondering the claims of the northern counties of England, which he had visited. He had conversed with Mr. Parsons at Leeds on this subject; and now a paper of his upon it was sent to him by Dr. Simpson, of Hoxton College, for consideration. And he did consider it deeply. "I pray God," he says, "that matters may be so ordered in Edinburgh, that I may be allowed to labour in these benighted and barren regions. If he intends me to be useful there, I know he will open my way. I am simply waiting to see what is God's will, and resolve to study his leadings more than ever; persuaded that if God do not send me, I may as well preach to rocks and mountains."

To mount a pulpit is, to one order of young men, as much an object of worldly ambition as it is to a higher order to get into parliament. Fortunately Campbell was well fitted to fulfil the duties of the function to which he had long aspired. After enjoying to the full what we take the liberty to call the dissipation of the London religious season, he returned to Glasgow to pursue his studies, or his exercise of preaching in the neighbouring villages. Mr. Robert Haldane wished him to settle in Rutherglen, where he might have found a congregation: but this he declined, though he called Rutherglen "my bishoprick." All this while some one else must have been carrying on his ironmongery and tract trade in Edinburgh. In this year he made a long preaching tour in the Highlands with Mr. James Haldane. In the course of their travels they visited Inverness, Caithness, and Orkney; though Scott's anecdote of the Pechs belongs to a subsequent visit, made in 1814. In the autumn of the same year he made another tour with Mr. Haldane to the south west of Scotland. Concluding the history of their joint labours at this time, Dr. Philip inquires—

How did Mr. Campbell manage afterwards to eschew all the vagaries of Haldanism? Now he certainly did not escape the contagion, from any lack of effort to inoculate him with the virus. Even after he had settled at Kingsland, he was strongly urged to make his new sphere a scene of Scotch novelties. He was even solemnly warned, and sarcastically too, against preferring usefulness to order and discipline. What his answers to these appeals were, I leave Mr. Robert Haldane to tell: but the real secret of his steadfastness was this,—he could not turn to one of his many letters, long or short, from Mr. Newton,—and they were his “Urim and Thummim” on such points,—without finding cautions against preferring circumstantialities to essentials and usefulness.

In the end of the same year, Mr. Campbell having several calls, accepted that to Kingsland, where he remained till his death, or for thirty-seven years. It was no tempting piece of preferment to a worldly-minded man; and after being first settled, he had for some time to teach a school to eke out his narrow stipend. But the congregation at Kingsland thrived apace, and his circumstances mended with its prosperity. He had, during nearly his whole life, lived with his aunt, Mrs. Bower, at the Sciennes. For her he entertained the affection of a son, and she had been to him as a mother; and when settled at Kingsland, his first business was to write her several very charming kindly letters, telling her in substance that he could not think himself at home in London unless she came also. Among other things he says,—

I am persuaded, aunt, you would like this place very well. I assure you it is as near a throne of grace as in Edinburgh. We have the very same sun and moon that you have in Scotland, and the same Bible. I think I see you coming full sail up the Thames; supposing yourself almost in a new world, and riding five miles along streets before you came to my parish, and asking where is Scotland now! You could take a trip to Aberdeen with as great facility from London as from Leith; you would only have a little more sea-water to pass over, and perhaps a little more sea-sickness to endure.

I hope the Lord will make your way clear to come up here. I shall have a good house, and many friends ready to receive you and Mary with open arms. But you should write to Aberdeen, and consult with my cousin (her son) what is proper. If you were not to come, I could not think myself at home in London. The air is as good at Kingsland as at the Sciennes; and it is as much in the country,—and I assure you there are several very anxious to know whether you will consent to come and live among them or not. I know that the thought of parting with a place and people with whom we have been long intimate, is painful; I have experienced the truth of this,—but remembering how short a time we have to remain on earth, will overcome that. Abraham was not a stoic; the command of God to leave his kindred and country tried his feelings, but he followed the will of God. He did not know to what country he was going when he left Ur, but you know where you are going if you leave Edinburgh.

The good old lady went to him.—His first introduction to the leading persons of Kingsland Chapel is worthy of notice. A missionary society had been formed in Edinburgh, and several young men had volunteered to go over under the Sierra Leone Company. Many of them died, and the mission terminated. Mr. Campbell relates—

Musing on the unhealthiness of the climate to European constitutions, one morning, when stepping out of bed, this thought occurred—‘Might we not bring over Africa to England; educate her; when some through grace and gospel might be converted, and sent back to Africa,—if not any converted, yet they might help to spread civilisation, so all would not be lost.’ The amount of which was, ‘To try to bring over twenty or thirty, or more, boys and girls from the coast of Guinea, through the influence of Governor Macaulay; educate them in Edinburgh, and send them back to their own country, to spread knowledge, especially Scripture knowledge.’

He laid his plan before Mr. Wilberforce, Mr. Henry Thornton, and the late Mr. Charles Grant, then Chairman of the East India Company, and the result was, that the children were brought over, though, when he went to receive them, some misunderstanding arose; and they were not educated in Edinburgh. This was but one of the many benevolent and enlightened projects which he suggested and saw accomplished. He was, as has been noticed, much engaged in the publication of tracts, an original project of his, and in watching the revivals in Wales and in the Highlands, which probably formed the theme of some of the tracts, when his attention was called to a humane enterprise lying nearer his own door.

About this time, he says, “There were two zealous Christians in Edinburgh, who made some attempts to reform some street-walkers in their neighbourhood; Mr. William Finlay, master baker, and William Coutts, journeyman cutler, or pewterer, I forget which. They related to me these attempts, with the effects their conversations had upon some;—that there were two or three girls who seemed very willing to relinquish their way of living, if they could obtain any other way of supporting themselves;—that they had lost character, and no families would receive them as servants without a character; therefore, they said, they did not continue in prostitution, from choice, but necessity. For their relief, we thought of hiring two or three rooms from poor but pious females, where they could be lodged, and provided for; but in this plan we found out formidable difficulties. We then got Mr. William Pattison, a respectable haberdasher, to enter warmly into our scheme, for devising some plan for relieving these outcasts of society. After several consultations together, we resolved to invite thirty or forty persons to consider the propriety of forming a society for supporting an institution, for receiving such of that class of persons as professed repentance and a sincere desire to live a virtuous life. I wrote out a small circular, which I signed, and got neatly printed, inviting a meeting in the Hall of the Society for Promoting Christian Knowledge, to consider the above proposition. These circulars were addressed to a number of respectable persons, and, what was peculiarly gratifying to us originators, was, that almost every person who had been invited, attended;—three of the City bailies (or aldermen) attended in their gold chains.

Under such happy auspices the Magdalen Institution was formed. A fact interesting to medical men, and a lesson to all in the treatment of hysterical affections, is given by Mr. Campbell in describing the inmates of the new institution:—

“A house, with a little ground behind it, was taken in the middle of the West Bow, which was soon filled with inmates, of some of whom we had soon reason to entertain hopes of a radical reform. The rooms were small, and, from the confined situation, little fresh air could be obtained. In a short time a very discouraging occurrence took place. A young woman was admitted, who soon was seized with nervous fits, which in a few days were communicated to almost all the other inmates; which nearly put an end to all work. I summoned a meeting of the directors, to consider what was to be done.

“When a quorum assembled, we proceeded to business. The state of the females was laid before them. Dr. Charles Stuart being a physician, and present, was looked to for his advice. He said they had a power in their will to resist taking those fits, if they would exert it; and mentioned the case of upwards of a hundred girls in an hospital at Amsterdam, having taken those fits; that the physicians of that city tried various means for removing the fits, without producing any beneficial effect. They invited Linnæus to Amsterdam, that they might have his assistance in devising means for removing the disease, especially as the governors were talking of breaking up the institution. He came, and his advice was, that the hangman should be clothed in the most terrific dress they could invent; that he should go into the rooms where the girls were, carrying with him two red-hot irons; tell them he knew that they had power to resist the fits when they were coming on; wherefore if any one took them, that he had orders to apply those hot irons to the feet of any one who took the fits. They acted upon this advice, and no more fits made their appearance in that hospital. Dr. Stuart was then asked, how we should act in reference to our females? He said he believed that the most of those females had been before Bailie Wood, as a magistrate, and that they had a greater terror of him than they had of any other magistrate; and he recommended that he should meet with them to-morrow, and talk to them on the subject in his own way, as he should think best.

"I had them all ready to meet him next morning at eleven o'clock. They were seated opposite to him. He took up his glass, and looked through it to the face of the first, and continued looking till she turned away her face. After doing the same to each of the ten, he said, 'I know you all; you have been before me as culprits, and here you expect to live in idleness, diverting yourselves with fits. That shall not be permitted. I shall order a cellar under Bedlam to be cleared, and that shall be the residence of the fit-takers.' These and various other things he said with an austerity and firmness of tone, that left a deep impression on their minds, and banished all their nervous fits, every one returning to her former occupation."

While Mr. Campbell was studying in Glasgow, he one day dined with Dr. Penmann when three of the city bailies were present, and he took the opportunity of recommending a Magdalen Asylum. He relates:—

I mentioned the rise and progress of the Edinburgh Magdalen, and the discoveries we had made of the peculiar wretchedness of many in that class of society, from the stings of conscience, and who had no way of extricating themselves from being real outcasts from society. As a sample,—we know of three or four such females who lived together in a room. It sometimes happened in a stormy night, when they were alone, that some of them would be so overwhelmed with horror, that they would try to ascend the chimney to hide themselves from the devil; that the erection of such an institution was the opening of one door of hope to such wretched individuals; also all who were reformed was lessening the number of the tempters and ruiners of young men. After having finished my statements, the first person who spoke was a Mr. Hamilton, then well known in Glasgow. All he said was, 'If Mr. Campbell's proposal be carried into effect, I promise to contribute one hundred pounds!'

These things remain the blessing and praise of the useful life of this good man. But his usefulness was of an extended kind, embracing many objects. He was an early and a successful writer for children in "his own line of things," which was not that "of idle story-books." His first and most popular little book, "Worlds Displayed," has gone through many editions both in England and America, and done good to many. He projected The Edinburgh Missionary Magazine, of which, however, Dr. Greville Ewing became the editor. He seems to have brought out an edition of the works of Mr. Robert Riccalton, the metaphysical minister of Hobkirk; and the MS. letters of Colonel Blackaden having been put into his hands by Mr. Newton, after being accidentally recovered in a snuff-shop in Stirling, he published them in connexion with Dr. Stuart, who wrote for the work an historical account of the Blackader family. On other occasions, Dr. Stuart acted as the critic and literary director or assistant of Campbell.

Although not distinguished in literature, and making no pretensions of the kind, he was always fond of books—a taste common among the young men of Edinburgh; and at Kingsland he began a book society, "of which he was long," says his biographer, "the centre and the charm, by his varied information, vivacity, and urbanity." He had not been long settled there when he projected The Youth's Magazine, which had a very extensive sale. The profits of the magazine were devoted to useful and benevolent purposes. But a Penny Magazine, which he afterwards commenced for children, entitled The Teacher's Offering, had a much wider circulation, which even rose to the astonishing number of between forty and fifty thousand copies. The sale of the modern penny and three-halfpenny periodicals is not therefore so wonderful, when the change of times is considered. He was for many years the editor of both these publications, and contributed a good deal to them in a style of simplicity peculiarly adapted to charm juvenile readers. The same happy knack made him be often selected to preach to the young.

We believe that he published the journals kept on his preaching tours. His African journals, giving the history of his first and second expedition, are well-known and popular works; for his fame as a traveller soon became even greater than his popularity as an itinerant preacher. Of that fame in the Highlands, his namesake, the author of the "Pleasures of Hope," tells a good story, thus reported by Dr. Philip:—

The poet, after he had acquired fame, went into the Highlands, indulging some curiosity to know whether his name had found its way over the mountains and into the glens of his native land. On one occasion, he modestly inquired of an old lady, if they knew anything of Mr. Campbell in that quarter! "Know him," she said, "every one knows Maister Campbell here." Now, thought the poet, this is true fame! "I am Mr. Campbell," he said. The old lady exclaimed—"What, and are you really and truly the great Mr. Campbell!" The poet began to qualify the word, "great," before he would appropriate it to himself. This startled the worthy matron, and led her to ask, "But are you the great Mr. Campbell of Lattakoo?" This question dissolved all the vision.

We suspect that some persons will be ready to say, that Dr. Philip has heaped too many laurels upon John Campbell, and sometimes accorded him honours which properly belong to others. Not only were Religious Tracts, a Scottish Missionary Society, the Magdalen Hospitals of Edinburgh and Glasgow, Sabbath Schools, and Village Preaching, of his projecting, and in a great measure of his establishing, but he projected the very Tabernacle, the tap-root and feeder of many of them. He tells it thus himself:—

"About a year and a half after this, I was invited by Mr. Haldane to meet a few excellent Christians, who were to sup at his house. At one time there was a short pause in the conversation, when, I suppose, every one was thinking what topic he could start. A Mr. Alexander Pitcairn, who sat opposite to me, said, Mr. C., what has become of your African scheme! To which I replied, 'It is put off to the peace!'

general smile, as few expected peace till Buonaparte had got the world under his feet. Mr. Haldane asked, from the head of the table, what African scheme I had, never having heard of it? This I answered as briefly as I could, but added, 'I had another scheme in my head, as important as the African one.' 'What is that?' 'To have a Tabernacle built in Edinburgh.' 'What is that?' asked Mr. Haldane. 'The Tabernacle in London is a large place of worship, supplied by popular ministers, of different denominations, coming up from the country, and preaching for a month. The crowds that it attracts, and the good that has been done, are very great.' All agreed that such a thing was desirable. 'Who could be got to supply it?' I mentioned Rowland Hill and other English ministers. 'Could a large place be obtained for a year on trial, before proceeding to building?' 'Yes, the use of the Circus may be got for Sabbaths; as the Relief congregation, who have had it while their new place was building, are on the eve of leaving it. When I first proposed the Circus, Mr. Haldane turned to a certain lawyer who was present, saying, Mr. D., will you inquire about it to-morrow, and if it be to let, take it for a year?'

"It was secured the next day; Rowland Hill was invited; he consented to come; and did come in the month of May or June.—The place was crowded even at seven o'clock in the morning,—and in the evenings, if the weather was good, no place could have contained the crowds that came to hear; they mounted to near the summit of the Calton-hill, where there was a spot resembling an amphitheatre, as if excavated to hold a congregation of 10,000, which number I believe sometimes attended him."

When he had been nine or ten years settled at Kingsland, from which, according to his original stipulation with the congregation, he every year made long preaching tours, the death of Dr. Vanderkemp occurred, and the Directors of the London Missionary Society could fix upon no one so well qualified as Mr. Campbell to follow him, and superintend the missions to the Hottentots and in Caffreland. This supposed a long separation from his people, but not the surrender of the pastoral office; and the congregation consented for a time to give him up to the high duty to which he had been called. Of this, and also of his second visit to Africa, he has left ample and well-known records in his published volumes; and of these Dr. Philip has made free use, even to the extent of being liable to the charge of wholesale book-making.

To forward missionary objects, Mr. Campbell made preaching tours, after his final return from Africa; and from the marvels which he had to relate, which he accommodated most felicitously to the taste of his auditors, he became quite a missionary licia; a fame which we think he rather, in a modest way, enjoyed. Late in life he married, and, for the encouragement of old bachelors, to the great advancement of his domestic happiness; and to the very close of life he was actively engaged in the business of the various religious societies of London. It was, after his marriage, proposed to send him out as a missionary to the South Seas; but this he declined. Some years before his death he visited his old friends in Edinburgh; and "The Life and Times" closes with extracts from the letters written to his friends, the Wallaces, in consequence of this renewal of love and social intercourse. He died in April 1840, at the age of seventy-four. His memory received every testimony of affection and respect, which that of so good, pious, and useful a man deserved.

EMERSON'S ESSAYS.*

MR. CARLYLE ought to love this American. If not submitting to be his disciple, or to call any man master, he is of the same brotherhood. And Mr. Carlyle does love and admire him enough, to be not sure of how he may be welcomed among the present degenerate race of English readers, the "Great reading public." Yet this Essayist possesses some of those qualities which enable an author "to take the sow by the ear." He is passionate, bold, somewhat dogmatic, and at times sufficiently mystical or unintelligible to become piquant. Mr. Carlyle considers him personally as "less notable for what he has spoken or done, than for the many things he has not spoken and forborne to do;" which is a kind of riddle to which we have no key, save that his most notable quality is, that, in a "never-resting locomotive-country," he possesses "the valuable talent of sitting still"—that he is, in short, a soul apart; a "voice in the wilderness;" a philosophic observer of the stir, the vanities, the bustle and contention of the society in which he is placed; philosophically contemptuous of its frivolous pursuits, superior to its sordid ambitions, nay, indifferent to the acquisition of dollars—a phoenix of a Yankee, and a rare character anywhere. But if the man is not of the common order, neither are his sermons; for his eloquent and sometimes over-strained and voluble declamation partakes more of the vehement nature of spoken language than of the tranquil character of the written expression of thought. His essays are twelve in number. They may be described as so many discourses on the very texts afterwards laid down by Mr. Carlyle in that preface, in which he warmly praises "this brave Emerson, seated by his rustic hearth, silently communing with his own soul, and with the God's world it finds itself alive in." He is a man who, when he is told by his commonplace contemporaries of Realities, is entitled to reply—

Yes, ye contemporaries, be it known to you, or let it remain unknown, there is one man who does not need to be a king; king neither of nations, nor of parishes or cliques, nor even of cent-per-annuums; nor indeed of anything at all save of himself only. "Realities!" Yes, your dollars are real, your cotton and molasses are real; so are presidencies, senatorships, celebrations, reputations, and the wealth of Rothschild; but to me, on the whole, they are not the reality that will suffice. To me, without some other reality, they are mockery, and amount to zero, nay, to a negative quantity. ETERNITIES surround this god-given life of mine: what will all the dollars in creation do for me! Dollars, dignities, senate-addresses, review-articles, gilt coaches or cavalcades, with world-wide huzzains and parti-coloured beef-eaters never so many: O Heaven, what were all these? Behold, ye shall have all these, and I will endeavour for a thing other than these. Behold, we will entirely agree to differ in this matter; I to be in your eyes nothing, you to be something, to be much, to be all things:—wherefore, adieu in God's name; go ye that way, I go this!—Pity that a man, for such cause, should be so distinguished from all his contemporaries!

Such, according to his congenial Editor, is the preacher who has sat still and kept silence amidst the profession and place-hunting, and greedy dollar-gathering of his contemporaries; some of whom may well wonder what kind of world this would be, if the contemplative philosophers had it all to themselves.

Mr. Emerson, who, we believe, enjoys a considerable reputation in one select and highly intellectual circle of his own country, has lectured publicly in Boston and in other places; but this is his first book, and it is not a hasty one. The essays it contains are, we have said, more properly lectures. To give their titles would convey no true idea of their nature, save in a few instances. With something of Carlyleism, and Coleridgeism, and Kantism, and of many other isms, this Massachusetts philosopher reminds us most of the citizen of Geneva; not the semi-sensual or sentimental Rousseau of the New Heloise, but the eloquent and paradoxical declaimer on the savage state. But the essays, with a leavening of many philosophies, contain some original and robust thought; and, as they may best explain themselves, we shall call a few specimens, not to show what is quaint in their style, or faulty in their structure, but what is highest or wisest in the philosophy of the author, and most original in his style and cast of mind.

Mr. Carlyle has given us a volume about Heroes, and Mr. Emerson an "Essay on Heroism and the Heroic in Human Nature," from which we select a few of the distinguishing heroic traits:—

Our culture must not omit the arming of the man. Let him hear in season, that he is born into the state of war, and that the commonwealth and his own wellbeing require that he should not go dancing in the weeds of peace; but warned, self-collected, and neither defying nor dreading the thunder, let him take both reputation and life in his hand, and with perfect urbanity dare the gibbet and the mob by the absolute truth of his speech and the rectitude of his behaviour.

Towards all this external evil the man within the breast assumes a warlike attitude, and affirms his ability to cope single-handed with the infinite army of enemies. To this military attitude of the soul we give the name of Heroism. Its rudest form is the contempt for safety and ease, which makes the attractiveness of war. It is a self-trust which slights the restraints of prudence, in the plenitude of its energy and power to repair the harms it may suffer. The hero is a mind of such balance that no disturbances can shake his will; but pleasantly, and as it were merrily, he advances to his own music, alike in frightful alarms and in the tipsy mirth of universal dissoluteness. There is somewhat not philosophical in heroism; there is somewhat not holy in it; it seems not to know that other souls are of one texture with it; it hath pride; it is the extreme of individual nature. Nevertheless we must profoundly revere it. There is somewhat in great actions, which does not allow us to go behind them. Heroism feels and never reasons, and therefore is always right; and although a different breeding, different religion, and greater intellectual activity, would have modified or even reversed the particular action, yet for the hero, that thing he does is the highest deed, and is not open to the censure of philosophers or divines. It is the avowal of the unschooled man, that he finds a quality in him that is negligent of expense, of health, of life, of danger, of hatred, of reproach, and that he knows that his will is higher and more excellent than all actual and all possible antagonists.

Heroism works in contradiction to the voice of mankind, and in contradiction, for a time, to the voice of the great and good. Heroism is an obedience to a secret impulse of an individual's character. Now to no other man can its wisdom appear as it does to him, for every man must be supposed to see a little farther on his own proper path than any one else. Therefore, just and wise men take umbrage at his act, until after some little time be past; then they see it to be in unison with their acts. All prudent men see that the action is clean contrary to a sensual prosperity; for every heroic act measures itself by its contempt of some external good. But it finds its own success at last, and then the prudent also extol.

Self-trust is the essence of Heroism. It is the state of the soul at war; and its ultimate objects are the last defiance of falsehood and wrong, and the power to bear all that can be inflicted by evil agents. It speaks the truth, and it is just. It is generous, hospitable, temperate, scornful of petty calculations, and scornful of being scorned. It persists; it is of an undaunted boldness, and of a fortitude not to be wearied out. Its jest is the littleness of common life. That false prudence which dotes on health and wealth is the foil, the butt and merriment of heroism. Heroism, like Plotinus, is almost ashamed of its body. What shall it say, then, to the sugar-plums and cats'-cradles, to the toilet, compliments, quarrels, cards, and custard, which rack the wit of all human society? What joys has kind nature provided for us dear creatures! There seems to be no interval between greatness and meanness. When the spirit is not master of the world, then is it its dupe. Yet the little man takes the great hoax so innocently, works in it so headlong and believing, is born red, and dies gray, arranging his toilet, attending on his own health, laying traps for sweet food and strong wine, setting his heart on a horse or a rifle, made happy with a little gossip or a little praise, that the great soul cannot choose but laugh at such earnest nonsense. "Indeed, these humble considerations make me out of love with greatness. What a disgrace is it to me to take note how many pairs of silk stockings thou hast, namely, these and those that were the peach-coloured ones; or to bear the inventory of thy shirts, as one for superfluity, and one other for use!"

The magnanimous know very well, that they who give time, or money, or shelter to the stranger—so it be done for love, and not for ostentation—do as it were to put God under obligation to them, so perfect are the compensations of the universe. In some way, the time they seem to lose is redeemed, and the pains they seem to take, remunerate themselves. These men fan the flame of human love, and raise the standard of civil virtue among mankind. But hospitality must be for service, and not for show, or it pulls down the host. The brave soul rates itself too high to value itself by the splendour of its table and draperies. It gives what it hath, and all it hath; but its own majesty can lend a better grace to bannocks and fair water than belong to city feasts.

The temperance of the hero proceeds from the same wish to do no dishonour to the worthiness he has. But he loves it for its elegance, not for its austerity. It seems not worth his while to be solemn, and denounce with bitterness flesh-eating or wine-drinking, the use of tobacco, or opium, or tea, or silk, or gold. A great man scarcely knows how he dines, how he dresses; but without railing or precision, his living is natural and poetic. John Eliot, the Indian Apostle, drank water, and said of wine, "It is a noble, generous liquor, and we should be humbly thankful for it; but, as I remember, water was made before it." Better still is the temperance of king

David, who poured out on the ground unto the Lord the water which three of his warriors had brought him to drink at the peril of their lives.

It is told of Brutus, that when he fell on his sword, after the battle of Philippi, he quoted a line of Euripides, "O virtue, I have followed thee through life, and I find thee at last but a shade." I doubt not the hero is slandered by this report. The heroic soul does not sell its justice and its nobleness. It does not ask to dine nicely and to sleep warm. The essence of greatness is the perception that virtue is enough. Poverty is its ornament. Plenty it does not need, and can very well abide its loss.

But that which takes my fancy most, in the heroic class, is the good humour and hilarity they exhibit. It is a height to which common duty can very well attain, to suffer and to dare with solemnity. But these rare souls set opinion, success, and life, at so cheap a rate, that they will not soothe their enemies by petitions, or the show of sorrow, but wear their own habitual greatness. Scipio, charged with peculation, refuses to do himself so great a disgrace as to wait for justification, though he had the scroll of his accounts in his hands, but tears it to pieces before the tribunes. Socrates' condemnation of himself to be maintained in all honour in the Prytaneum during his life, and Sir Thomas More's playfulness at the scaffold, are of the same strain.

Our readers may perceive that this American sage is no commonplace writer—no silly sheep following the bell-wether.

We find "An Essay on Prudence," and the prudence is of a very healthful kind; but first this passage on nonconformity and conformity, which occurs in another discourse, and will be easily understood, which cannot be affirmed of all these disquisitions:—

Whoso would be a man must be a nonconformist. He who would gather immortal palms must not be hindered by the name of goodness, but must explore if it be goodness. Nothing is at last sacred but the integrity of our own mind. Absolve you to yourself, and you shall have the suffrage of the world. I remember an answer which, when quite young, I was prompted to make to a valued adviser who was wont to importune me with the dear old doctrines of the church. On my saying—What have I to do with the sacredness of traditions, if I live wholly from within? My friend suggested—"But these impulses may be from below, not from above." I replied—"They do not seem to me to be such; but if I am the devil's child, I will live then from the devil." No law can be sacred to me but that of my nature. Good and bad are but names, very readily transferable to that or this; the only right is what is after my constitution, the only wrong what is against it. A man is to carry himself in the presence of all opposition as if everything were titular and ephemeral but he. I am ashamed to think how easily we capitulate to badges and names, to large societies and dead institutions. Every decent and well-spoken individual affects and sways me more than is right. I ought to go upright and vital, and speak the rude truth in all ways. If malice and vanity wear the coat of philanthropy, shall that pass? If an angry bigot assumes this bountiful cause of Abolition, and comes to me with his last news from Barbadoes, why should I not say to him—"Go, love thy infant; love thy wood-chopper: be good-natured and modest; have that grace; and never varnish your hard, uncharitable ambition with this incredible tenderness for black folk a thousand miles off. Thy love afar is spite at home." Rough and graceless would be such greeting, but truth is handsomer than the affectation of love. Your goodness must have some edge to it—else it is none. The doctrine of hatred must be preached, as the counteraction of the doctrine of love when that pulses and whines. I shun father and mother and wife and brother, when my genius calls me. I would write on the lintels of the door-post, Whim. I hope it is somewhat better than whim at last, but we cannot spend the day in explanation. Expect me not to show cause why I seek or why I exclude company. Then, again, do not tell me, as a good man did to-day, of my obligation to put all poor men in good situations. Are they my poor? I tell thee, thou foolish philanthropist, that I grudge the dollar, the dime, the cent I give to such men as do not belong to me, and to whom I do not belong. There is a class of persons to whom by all spiritual affinity I am bought and sold; for them I will go to prison, if need be; but your miscellaneous popular charities; the education at college of fools; the building of meeting-houses to the vain end to which many now stand; alms to sots; and the thousandfold Relief Societies;—though I confess with shame I sometimes succumb and give the dollar, it is a wicked dollar which by and by I shall have the manhood to withhold.

The objection to conforming to usages that have become dead to you, is, that it scatters your force. It loses your time, and blurs the impression of your character. If you maintain a dead church, contribute to a dead Bible-Society, vote with a great party either for the Government or against it, spread your table like base housekeepers,—under all these screens, I have difficulty to detect the precise man you are. And, of course, so much force is withdrawn from your proper life. But do your thing, and I shall know you. Do your work, and you shall reinforce yourself. A man must consider what a blind-man's-buff is this game of conformity. If I know your sect, I anticipate your argument. I hear a preacher announce for his text and topic the expediency of one of the institutions of his church. Do I not know beforehand that not possibly can he say a new and spontaneous word? Do I not know that with all this ostentation of examining the grounds of the institution, he will do no such thing? Do I not know that he is pledged to himself not to look but at one side: the permitted side, not as a man, but as a parish minister? He is a retained attorney, and these airs of the bench are the emptiest affectation. Well, most men have bound their eyes with one or another handkerchief, and attached themselves to some one of these communities of opinion. This conformity makes them not false in a few particulars, authors of a few lies, but false in all particulars. Their every truth is not quite true. Their two is not the real two, their four not the real four; so that every word they say chagrins us, and we know not where to begin to set them right. Meantime nature is not slow to equip us in the prison-uniform of the party to which we adhere. We come to wear one cut of face and figure, and acquire by degrees the gentlest asinine expression. There is a mortifying experience in particular which does not fail to wreak itself also in the general history; I mean, "the foolish face of praise," the forced smile which we put on in company where we do not feel at ease, in answer to conversation which does not interest us. The muscles, not spontaneously moved, but moved by a low usurping wilfulness, grow tight about the outline of the face, and make the most disagreeable sensation,—a sensation of rebuke and warning which no brave young man will suffer twice.

What is most peculiar in Mr. Emerson's philosophy—for, though he soars above all systems, he has a philosophy—is faintly indicated in the following passages:—

It is for want of self-culture that the idol of Traveling, the idol of Italy, of England, of Egypt, remains for all educated Americans. They who made England, Italy, or Greece venerable in the imagination, did so not by rambling round creation as a moth round a lamp, but by sticking fast where they were, like an axis of the earth. In manly hours we feel that duty is our place, and that the merry-men of circumstances should follow as they may. The soul is no traveller: the wise man stays at home with the soul; and when his necessities, his duties, on any occasion call him from his house, or into foreign lands, he is at home still, and is not gadding abroad from himself, and shall make men sensible by the expression of his countenance, that he goes the missionary of wisdom and virtue, and visits cities and men like a sovereign, and not like an interloper or a valet.

I have no churlish objection to the circumnavigation of the globe for the purposes of art, of study, and benevolence, so that the man is first domesticated, or does not go abroad with the hope of finding somewhat greater than he knows. He who travels to be amused, or to get somewhat which he does not carry, travels away from himself, and grows old even in youth among old things. In Thebes, in Palmyra, his will and mind have become old and dilapidated as they. He carries ruins to ruins.

Travelling is a fool's paradise. We owe to our first journeys the discovery that place is nothing. At home I dream that at Naples, at Rome, I can be intoxicated with beauty, and lose my sadness. I pack my trunk, embrace my friends, embark on the sea, and at last wake up in Naples; and there beside me is the stern Fact, the sad Self, unrelenting, identical, that I fled from. I seek the Vatican, and the palaces. I affect to be intoxicated with sights and suggestions, but I am not intoxicated. My giant goes with me wherever I go.

But the rage of travelling is itself only a symptom of a deeper unsoundness, affecting the whole intellectual action. The intellect is vagabond, and the universal system of education fosters restlessness. Our minds travel when our bodies are forced to stay at home. We imitate; and what is imitation but the travelling of the mind! Our houses are built with foreign taste; our shelves are garnished with foreign ornaments; our opinions, our tastes, our whole minds lean, and follow the Past and the Distant, as the eyes of a maid follow her mistress. The soul created the arts wherever they have flourished. It was in his own mind that the artist sought his model. It was an application of his own thought to the thing to be done and the conditions to be observed.

Insist on yourself; never imitate. Your own gift you can present every moment with the cumulative force of a whole life's cultivation; but of the adopted talent of another you have only an extemporaneous, half possession. That which each can do best, none but his Maker can teach him. No man yet knows what it is, nor can, till that person has exhibited it. Where is the master who could have taught Shakespeare? Where is the master who could have instructed Franklin, or Washington, or Bacon, or Newton? Every great man is an unique. The Scipionism of Scipio is precisely that part he could not borrow. If anybody will tell me whom the great man imitates in the original crisis when he performs a great act, I will tell him who else than himself can teach him. Shakespeare will never be made by the study of Shakespeare. Do that which is assigned thee, and thou canst not hope too much or dare too much.

Nature will not have us fret and fume. She does not like our benevolence or our learning, much better than she likes our frauds and wars. When we come out of the caucus, or the bank, or the Abolition-convention, or the Temperance-meeting, or the Transcendental club, into the fields and woods, she says to us, "So hot, my little sir!"

We are full of mechanical actions. We must needs intermeddle, and have things in our own way, until the sacrifices and virtues of society are odious. Love should make joy; but our benevolence is unhappy. Our Sunday-schools, and churches, and pauper-societies, are yokes to the neck. We pain ourselves to please nobody. There are natural ways of arriving at the same ends at which these aim, but do not arrive. Why should all virtue work in one and the same way? Why should all give dollars? It is very inconvenient to us country folk, and we do not think any good will come of it. We have not dollars. Merchants have: let them give them. Farmers will give corn. Poets will sing. Women will sew. Labourers will lend a hand. The children will bring flowers. And why drag this dead weight of a Sunday-school over the whole Christendom? It is natural and beautiful that childhood should inquire, and maturity should teach; but it is time enough to answer questions when they are asked.

Why should we make it a point with our false modesty to disparage that man we are, and that form of being assigned to us? A good man is contented. I love and honour Epaminondas, but I do not wish to be Epaminondas. I hold it more just to love the world of this hour than the world of his hour. Nor can you, if I am true, excite me to the least uneasiness by saying, "He acted and thou sittest still." I see action to be good, when the need is, and sitting still to be also good. Epaminondas, if he was the man I take him for, would have sat still with joy and peace, if his lot had been mine. Heaven is large, and affords space for all modes of love and fortitude. Why should we be busy-bodies and superserviceable? Action and inaction are alike to the true. One piece of the tree is cut for a weather-cock, and one for the sleeper of a bridge; the virtue of the wood is apparent in both.

I desire not to disgrace the soul. The fact that I am here, certainly shows me that the soul had need of an organ here. Shall I not assume the post? Shall I skulk, and dodge, and duck with my unseasonable apologies and vain modesty, and imagine my being here impertinent! less pertinent than Epaminondas or Homer being there! and that the soul did not know its own needs? Besides, without any reasoning on the matter, I have no discontent. The good soul nourishes me always, unlocks new magazines of power and enjoyment to me every day. I will not meanly decline the immensity of good, because I have heard it has come to others in another shape.

Besides, why should we be cowed by the name of Action? 'Tis a trick of the senses,—no more. We know that the ancestor of every action is a thought. The poor mind does not seem to itself to be anything, unless it have an outside badge,—some Gentoo diet, or Quaker coat, or Calvinistic prayer-meeting, or philanthropic society, or a great donation, or a high office, or, any how, some wild contrasting action to testify that it is somewhat. The rich mind lies in the sun and sleeps, and is Nature. To think is to act.

Let us, if we must have great actions, make our own so. All action is of an infinite elasticity, and the least admits of being inflated with the celestial air until it eclipses the sun and moon. Let us seek one peace by fidelity. Let me do my duties. Why need I go gadding into the scenes and philosophy of Greek and Italian history, before I have washed my own face, or justified myself to my own benefactors? How dare I read Washington's campaigns, when I have not answered the letters of my own correspondents? Is that not a just objection to much of our reading? It is a pusillanimous desertion of our work to gaze after our neighbours. It is peeping. Byron says of Jack Bunting,

He knew not what to say, and so he swore.

I may say it of our preposterous use of books; "He knew not what to do, and so he read." I can think of nothing to fill my time with, and so, without any constraint, I find the life of Brant. It is a very extravagant compliment to pay to Brant, or to General Schuyler, or to General Washington. My time should be as good as their time: my world, my facts, all my net of relations as good as theirs, or either of theirs. Rather let me do my work so well, that other idlers, if they choose, may compare my texture with the texture of these, and find it identical with the best.

From the Sermon on Prudence we now give the exhortations of the sifter-still, to improvident scholars, and to men of genius of ill-regulated minds and habits:—

Tasso's is no infrequent case in modern biography. A man of genius, of an ardent temperament, reckless of physical laws, self-indulgent, becomes presently unfortunate, querulous, a "discomfortable cousin," a thorn to himself and to others.

The scholar shames us by his bifold life. Whilst something higher than prudence is active, he is admirable; when common sense is wanted, he is an encumbrance. Yesterday Cæsar was not so great; to-day Job not so miserable. Yesterday radiant with the light of an ideal world, in which he lives, the first of men; and now oppressed by wants and by sickness, for which he must thank himself, none is so poor to do him reverence.

He resembles the opium-eaters, whom travellers describe as frequenting the bazaars of Constantinople, who skulk about all day, the most pitiful drivellers, yellow, emaciated, ragged, and sneaking: then, at evening, when the bazaars are open, they sink to the opium-shop, swallow their morsel, and become tranquil, glorious, and great. And who has not seen the tragedy of imprudent genius, struggling for years with paltry pecuniary difficulties, at last sinking, chilled, exhausted, and fruitless, like a giant slaughtered by pins?

Is it not better that a man should accept the first pains and mortifications of this sort, which nature is not slack in sending him, as hints that he must expect no other good than the just fruit of his own labour and self-denial?

Let him learn a prudence of a higher strain. Let him learn that everything in nature, even motes and feathers, go by law and not by luck, and that what he sows, he reaps. By diligence and self-command, let him put the bread he eats at his own disposal, and not at that of others, that he may not stand in bitter and false relations to other men; for the best good of wealth is freedom. Let him practise the minor virtues. How much of human life is lost in waiting! Let him not make his fellow-creatures wait. How many words and promises are promises of conversation! Let his be words of fate. When he sees a folded and sealed scrap of paper float round the globe in a pine ship, and come safe to the eye for which it was written, amidst a swarming population, let him likewise feel the admonition to integrate his being across all these distracting forces, and keep a slender human word among the storms, distances, and accidents that drive us hither and thither, and, by persistency, make the paltry force of one man reappear to redeem its pledge, after months and years, in the most distant climates.

It is a proverb, that "courtesy costs nothing;" but calculation might come to value love for its profit. Love is fabled to be blind; but kindness is necessary to perception; love is not a hood, but an eye-water. If you meet a sectary, or a hostile partisan, never recognise the dividing lines; but meet on what common ground remains,—if only that the sun shines, and the rain rains for both,—the area will widen very fast, and ere you know it, the boundary mountains, on which the eye had fastened, have melted into air. If he set out to contend, almost St. Paul will lie, almost St. John will hate. What low, poor, paltry, hypocritical people, an argument on religion will make of the pure and chosen souls! Shuffle they will, and crow, crook, and hide; feign to confess here, only that they may brag and conquer there; and not a thought has enriched either party, and not an emotion of bravery, modesty, or hope. So neither should you put yourself in a false position to your contemporaries, by indulging a vein of hostility and bitterness. Though your views are in straight antagonism to theirs, assume an identity of sentiment, assume that you are saying precisely that which all think, and in the flow of wit and love roll out your paradoxes in solid column, with not the infirmity of a doubt. So at least shall you get an adequate deliverance. The natural motions of the soul are so much better than the voluntary ones, that you will never do yourself justice in dispute. The thought is not then taken hold of by the right handle, does not show itself proportioned, and in its true bearings; but bears extorted, hoarse, and half witness. But assume a consent, and it shall presently be granted; since really, and underneath all their external diversities, all men are of one heart and mind.

Wisdom will never let us stand with any man or men on an unfriendly footing. We refuse sympathy and intimacy with people, as if we waited for some better sympathy and intimacy to come. But whence and when? To-morrow will be like to-day. Life wastes itself whilst we are preparing to live. Our friends and fellow-workers die off from us. Scarcely can we say, we see new men, new women approaching us. We are too old to regard fashion, too old to expect patronage of any greater or more powerful. Let us suck the sweetness of those affections and consuetudes that grow near us. These old shoes are easy to the feet. Undoubtedly, we can easily pick faults in our company, can easily whisper names prouder, and that tickle the fancy more. Every man's imagination hath its friends; and pleasant would life be with such companions. But if you cannot have them on good mutual terms, you cannot have them. If not the Deity, but our ambition hews and shapes the new relations, their virtue escapes, as strawberries lose their flavour in garden-beds.

Thus truth, frankness, courage, love, humility, and all the virtues, range themselves on the side of prudence, or the art of securing a present wellbeing.

We should fancy much of this latter wise counsel peculiarly necessary in the polemic and intolerant society of New England. To make the reader's idea of this new American writer a little more complete, we should have liked to cite from a singular and original essay he has quaintly named the Over-soul, and from that on Art, which contains some of those bold heresies which may become the truths of another age. The indifference or insensibility to Art, which Coleridge, Scott, and some of the greatest men of modern times have displayed, is ominous of change, of another phase of civilisation. The last-mentioned Essays afford a fuller exposition of our author's theories—if he may be said to have any system save having none—than the above quotations. But we must leave to the leisurely study of the reader the most seeming original portion of a volume, which as a whole embodies the oddest jumble of bold ideas, rhapsodies and notions, that he ever can have met with in the same narrow space.

LINES WRITTEN TO AN ITALIAN MELODY.

THE moonlit sea sleeps calm and bright
Beneath this soft Italian night;
Dark gondolas* in silence glide
Like swift death-shadows o'er the tide.

No more alternate gondolier
With Tasso's verse delights the ear;
Or with the wild romantic lay
Of Ariosto wings the day.†

From sea-born Venice' marble walls—
Her porticos and spacious halls—

The frowning stranger's‡ footsteps chase
The lingering Genius of the place.
Enchain'd, her Lion§ prostrate lies—
Deep-troubled slumber shrouds his eyes;
While ancient glories, heavenward fled,
Pour their pale beams around his head.

† Well might the Venetians complain of "il duro impero dell' Austriaca gente!"

§ This is only a poetical licence, figurative of the abasement of the Venetians. The winged-lion, emblem of the Venetian republic, still holds his place, but as a forlorn memento, on the top of one of the two columns that stand in the Piazzetta San Marco, where it opens upon the sea between the Doge's Palace and the Royal Palace, formerly the old Library. On the top of the other column, next to the Royal Palace, is a statue of St. Theodore, the ancient imaginary protector of the Venetian republic.

* The gloomy and funeral appearance of the Venetian gondolas is very remarkable.

† During my stay in Venice, in 1819, I heard no singing among the gondoliers.

A CRY FOR BREAD.*

BY MAJOR CALDER CAMPBELL.

I saw a starving mother stand
By the gates of a palace proud,
With a whining boy in either hand,
And an infant wailing loud;
An infant wailing loud,—for dry
Was the fount had wont to hush its cry;
And all that the starving woman said
Was—"Give my children BREAD!"

Forth from that palace proud there came
Three high and noble ones;
The first was a Bishop, stout of frame,
A chief 'mid the Church's sons;
Slowly he strode, for he was fat—
But, as he passed, he banned the brat
Whose cries disturbed his reverend head:
Yet the mother only uttered—"BREAD!"

The next that fared from that palace door
Was a Peer, of an ancient race;

* "It has been our practice hitherto to let the boding voice of the heralds or poets of the people go forth in our pages, and especially the emphatic cry—'GIVE US BREAD!'—Tail's Magazine, September, 1841. P. 567.

And he scowled on the beggars, and loudly swore
To drive them from the place:—
"Twas hard, 'twas very hard his doors
Should be thus beset by threes and fours
Of idle wretches!" So he said,—
Still the woman only murmured—"BREAD!"

And then paced forth a lady fair,
With a pale and haughty brow;
But she started to see the beggars there,
And fain their needs would know:
But a pampered menial, sly and sleek,
With a dastard's heart and a woman's cheek,
Spake out: "Impostors they!" he said:
So the mother vainly begged for BREAD!

That night, as the Bishop, Peer, and Dame,
Sat o'er their banquet high,
From a squalid cellar shrilly came
A wild and maniac cry;
And there, by her own mad hand, lay slain
That starving mother's children twain:
"And the infant!"—it before was dead,
For there was none to give it BREAD!

WRITTEN AT FLORENCE.

'Twas but a phantasy—a waking dream
Sketched by a pencil heated in the rays
Of fair Italia's sun—that sun alone
Her only glory left amid the rule
Of cold and heartless despots.

"Liberty! Freedom! Tyranny is dead!
Run hence, proclaim, cry it about the streets!"
Shakespeare's Julius Cæsar.

THE sun of my fortune is set!
In its place are the thunder-clouds met;
And, swelling and gathering fast,
They come on the far-rushing blast.
All trace that remains of the beam
Which brighten'd my earlier dream,
Is a red and portentous glare
Shooting up 'mid the dark troubled air,
And tinging the base of each cloud
With the hue of a blood-stained shroud.

I stand on a desolate shore,
And list to the wild-dashing waves
Sweeping round me with ceaseless roar,
Re-echoed from fathomless caves.
Above me are rocks, where the wing
Of the sea-bird gleams white in the blast—
Where the moss and the scentless flower spring,
And the spray of the ocean is cast.
The dark-heaving waters extend
To the lurid sky's far-distant bend,
That encircles, with girdle of gloom,
My spirit's companionless tomb.

I stand alone amid the waste of life,
Hating the tumult and unmeaning strife
That fill my ear, and strike upon my heart
With cold and deadly knell. I would depart—
Would leave my prison for some lonely place
Where no such sounds could reach me—where the race
Of man lives not, and where I might abide
With nature's spirit for my viewless bride.

And I would woo that spirit in the air—
The morning and the evening sky—and there
Would lay me at the feet of mountains high
And watch their misty veils with dreamy eye;
Peopling each dim-seen height with glorious things
More beautiful and pure than poet sings.

There, in the scent of odorous plants and flowers—
In gently falling dews and Summer showers,
I would inhale the breath and catch the tears
Of Nature; and would pass swift years
Among her solitudes, where sedgy brooks
Run murmuring near old caves and moss-grown nooks,
Losing themselves beneath the drooping shade
Of willows; or in sunless covert, made
By arching boughs of ancient evergreens
That shoot from tufted banks and rocky screens.
And, in the ev'ning woods, when day was done,
I'd choose among the birds the sweetest one—
The nightingale—and listen to her song
Which faint and distant echo would prolong.
In all these gentle sounds I would rejoice,
Since they belonged to Nature's various voice.
And, when the moon arose, I'd sit and trace
Strange mysteries in her calm and cloudless face,
Till—as a part of her—I felt my soul
Move onward in her silent course, and roll
Through boundless space, and scan the stars on high
With the deep glance of gifted scrutiny.

But this is not of life, and may not be!—
From Sorrow's scorpions who can shake him free?
It must be so!—weak man must suffer still,
And bear, as best he may, his weight of ill.

I would possess the power that might command
The elements; and grasp within my hand
Fork'd lightnings and the tempest's mighty breath—
Not to give wing to these, and scatter death
And desolation o'er the peopled earth,

But to give Freedom's soaring spirit birth !—
 Dash from the tyrant's hand his scepter'd power—
 Burst the strong walls of dark Oppression's tower—
 Make the bad tremble and the good rejoice,
 And teach man justice in the thunder's voice.

But this is not of life !—The ear of stone,
 And heart of colder hardness, hear the moan
 Of misery, reckless as flinty steep,
 O'er which the howling winds of winter sweep :—
 For, like to Ocean in his wildest hour,
 The tide of human passion's whelming power
 Riseth and rageth o'er the wrecks of men ;
 And, when its frantic force subsides again,
 Leaves many a deep-worn channel where the tears
 Of suffering wretches flow for long, long years.

But there may come a time when all shall be Equal in spirit—nobly bold and free !
 Free as the tameless wind that freshly blows
 Upon the Alpine-heights' eternal snows.
 'Tis not remote !—prophetic visions rise
 In solemn glory to the opening skies !—
 They soar !—they vanish !—but their light remains,
 And shines upon the world's despotic chains !
 The brightness of that awful gleam hath shed
 Its startling influence on the lowly bed
 Where man's inherent energies have slept,
 While spell-bound Freedom o'er their slumber wept.
 The spell is broken !—magic's dream is o'er !—
 The slumb'ring eye is waked to sleep no more !
 The march of Freedom shakes the peopled earth,
 And man regains the charter of his birth !

OLD ELSPETH.

OLD Elspeth was a cerlin dread,
 At least report said so,
 And near her door, when daylight fled,
 No youngster dared to go.
 And though old Elspeth much was bent,
 And used a staff by day,
 The gossips swore at night she'd mount
 And sail long leagues away !
 And all to mix, in rites unblest,
 With Satan and his band,
 Who, 'mid the gloom of mirk and mist,
 Rode riot o'er the land.
 Right fiercely sped the concourse dread,
 (Where Druid rings were seen ;
 Where Woden's fiery feast oft-spread
 In former times had been ;)
 To gloat their eyes on the blood-red stains
 The Runic piles that dyed,
 Which, after twice ten centuries' rains,
 Their searching glance descried.
 And past the spots, on dismal coasts,
 Where shipwrecked mariners lie ;
 And over moors, 'mong murderers' ghosts
 And goblin sprites, they'd hie.
 Full well 'twas seen how matters stood,
 For oft as morning beamed,
 To 'venturous wight, who dared intrude,
 Right wo-begone she seemed.
 And few made doubt her nights were spent
 In revels, far away,
 Who marked the change she underwent
 From the eve o' the bygone day.
 Sometimes she moaned and much she coughed,
 For which she blamed a cold ;
 And much theat the bumpkins scoffed,
 When sunshine made them bold.
 And daily 'plaints made all opine
 That Elspeth's searching eye
 Could blast the grain and scathe the kine
 Whene'er she chose to try !

And the sexton swore, 'mong sundry feats,
 That Elspeth's midnight spells
 Made dead men dance in their winding-sheets,
 To the sound of the Abbey bells !

In short, the fact was plain to all,
 If Elspeth there should stay,
 She'd have the village, hut and hall,
 Ere twelve moons passed, away.

Old Mertoun was a yeoman good,
 Who wonned hard by her dwelling ;
 And down the hill one morn he strode,
 Fierce rage his bosom swelling.

His cow was strangled in her stance,
 And little doubt had he
 That Elspeth caused the sad mischance
 By spells of witchery !

For he'd denied, with right good sense,
 Old Elspeth fuel or food ;
 For who would deal with her whose pence
 Might turn to stone or wood ?

So Mertoun raised a goodly band
 To souse the hag outright
 In some deep pond, to let her stand
 The test as best she might.

With whoop, halloo, and mingled din,
 They reached the beldame's door ;
 But who the first should venture in,
 Perplexed the party sore.

"'Twas Mertoun's job," the party said ;
 "The risk belonged to him ;"
 But Mertoun started back dismayed,
 And quaked at every limb !

With cautious step they ventured ben,
 And, stretched upon the bed,
 They found—ye powers ! what found they then ?—
 The fierce old beldame—dead !

By famine's grasp relieved from fears,
 And underneath her head
 A well-used Bible, wet with tears
 The poor old Witch had shed !

JAMES MURRAY.

SONNET TO MRS. —.

With oft reverting gaze I turn away,
 Thy beauty is too splendid to admit
 The mental exercise that doth befit,
 Enraptured genius, pining to portray
 Thy loveliness in song ; the liquid ray
 Of intellectual sadness in thine eye
 Reflecting majesty thou dost descry

Where others gazed not ; the impassioned play
 Of feeling on thy lustrous forehead gleaming
 Like sunlight upon snow, with soft control
 Prostrates in speechless ecstasy my soul,
 So sweetly circled by thy queenly beaming,
 That, should I sing, the notes would all be Thine
 Thyself, the noblest poetry to me.

Sketches of Scottish Church History. By the Rev. Thomas M'Crie. 12mo, pp. 583.

THE substance of these Sketches was delivered in Edinburgh as popular lectures, repeated, we believe, more than once. They were afterwards published in a religious periodical work; and are here collected into a thick volume. The author has the candour to make no pretensions to impartiality; yet he is quite as impartial as any true-blue Presbyterian stickler for the Kirk's Supremacy can well be. He is, moreover, not one of those who eat the bread which the State provides and guarantees for them, and defies its laws—not one of those who plead the rights of conscience in their own case, but make no scruple to violate the rights of the Jew, Catholic, or Quaker, whom conscience forbids paying stipend to those they consider false teachers—not one of those who consider themselves bound by one chapter of the Confession of Faith, but at liberty to throw off the "obligations" imposed by another. The history of the way in which the government and standards of the Church were framed, that is given in these Sketches, must have an effect which was certainly not contemplated by the author. It shows the Kirk to be entirely the creature of the State. We allude to the organization of the Westminster Assembly of Divines, called together by Parliament, and consisting of the ministers of all the prevailing religious denominations then known; namely, Prelatists, Independents, and Presbyterians. In the Assembly, called together by Parliament, sitting under the sanction of Parliament, "after a debate of thirty days the divine right of Presbytery was carried by an overwhelming majority:"—a majority of those ministers, called together by the State,—the fact is important. But if the Prelatists or Independents had predominated in the Assembly, where would have been "the divine right of Presbytery," and all the other divine rights now claimed by a party in the Kirk? Presbyterian government having been thus established, the Confession of Faith and the Catechisms were next drawn up; after which the Scottish ministers, who had acted as Commissioners for the Kirk when the Parliamentary summons was issued to Scotland, returned home.

It appears that no one was permitted to enter this Assembly without an order from Parliament. Baillie, one of the Scottish Commissioners, writes:

"The like of that Assembly I did never see, and, as we hear say, the like was never in England, nor any where is shortly like to be. No mortal man may enter to hear or see, let be to sit, without an order in writ from both houses of Parliament. They did sit in Henry the Seventh's Chapel; but since the weather grew cold, they did go to Jerusalem Chamber—a fair room in the abbey of Westminster, about the bounds of our College forehall. At the upmost end there is a chair set on a frame, a foot from the earth, for the prolocutor, Dr. Twiss. Before it, on the ground, stand two chairs for the Assessors, Dr. Burgess and Mr. White. Before these two chairs, through the length of the room, stands a table, at which sit the two scribes. The house is all well hung, and has a good fire, which is some dainties at London. Foranent the table, upon the prolocutor's right hand, there are three or four ranks of formes; on the lowest we five do sit; upon the others at our backs, the members of Parliament deputed to the Assemblies. On the formes foranent us, on the prolocutor's left hand, are four or five stages of formes ranged round the room, whereupon their divines sit as they please. We meet every day of the week but Saturday. We sit commonly from nine to one or two afternoon. The prolocutor, at the beginning and end, has a short prayer. Ordinarily there will be present about three score of their divines. After the prayer, the scribe reads the proposition and Scriptures, whereupon the Assembly debates in a most grave and orderly way."

This was clearly an assembly of ministers called together by Parliament, fairly to fight out the battle of contending sects, while the State lay by, ready to establish whatever should turn out to be the majority.

The first point that came before the Assembly, and which occupied the greater part of their time, was the thorny question of Church government. Our Scots ministers soon found, to their high satisfaction, that the great body of the Assembly was favourably disposed to the Presbyterian discipline. And had the matter been left to the mere force of numbers, little time would have sufficed to decide it. . . . The Independents occupied them no less than three weeks in debating the point of sitting at a communion-table. "The unhappy Independents," says Baillie, "would mangle that sacrament. No catechising nor preparation before; no thanksgiving after; no sacramental doctrine or chapters in the day of celebration; no coming up to any table, but a carrying of the elements to all in their seats athort the church: yet all this, with God's help, we have carried over them to our practice. We must dispute every inch of ground. Great need had we of the prayers of all God's people." This obstinacy was the less justifiable on the part of the Independents, as the Scottish ministers had agreed to drop several of their ancient practices in order to please them.

Many days were spent on the question of ruling elders. But the most important and lengthened debate in this Assembly, was regarding the divine right of Presbyterian government. The question was—Whether many congregations may, and by divine institution ought, to be under one Presbyterial government! After a debate which occupied thirty days, the divine right of Presbytery was carried by an overwhelming majority. The Independents entered their dissent, and, as is usual with the losing party, complained of unfair usage.

This religious effervescence produced the ordinary consequences. The Commissioners, sitting by authority of Parliament, had carried, by a majority, Presbyterian government, and adopted the existing Church standards. But the laity—the people, were far from being of one mind. Mark one effect of the Assembly's debates and decisions,—

About the time when the Westminster Assembly sat down, there were very few Dissenters in England,—and these were chiefly Independents, who had no regular churches, but went about the country disseminating their opinions; but in the course of a few years, during the civil war, they sprung up and multiplied in the most appalling numbers. The mere enumeration of these Sectaries would be a difficult task. Besides Papists and Prelatists, the only opponents with whom our Scots Presbyterians had to contend, there arose in England Independents and Brownists of all degrees, Millenarians, Antinomians, Anabaptists, Libertines, Familists, Seekers, Perfectists, Socinians, Arians, Antiscripturists, Fifth Monarchy Men, Ranters, Behemists, Quakers, and a host of other sects, nameless and numberless. Errors of every possible shade, heresies the most monstrous, and blasphemies the most revolting, were daily propagated; and the kingdom was convulsed in a religious fully as much as in a political sense.

Alarmed at this prodigious increase of sects and heresies, the Presbyterians implored the Parliament to use means to arrest the current, by a formal condemnation of them; and, above all, by erecting the discipline of the Church, with full power to proceed against them according to the laws of Christ. Without this sanction, their authority would have been disregarded, and the sentences of their courts might be reversed by an appeal to Parliament, which claimed the supreme jurisdiction. The Parliament, however, now under the influence of the Independent leaders, refused to adopt any such measures; and the only effect of the proposal was, that all parties joined against the Presbyterians. This coalition formed the only bond of union among the motley swarm of the Sectaries, and the motto inscribed on their banner was—Toleration, and Liberty of Conscience. Disagreeing about everything else, they all united in desiring full liberty to preach and propagate their own opinions; though even about this there were differences of opinion.

Some advanced the principle, that “it is the will and command of God, that, since the coming of his Son, a permission of the most Paganish, Jewish, Turkish, or Antichristian consciences and worships be granted to all men in all nations.”

The Presbyterians were shocked at such a principle, which seemed evasive of all religion; and some of them, in their zeal against it, condemned and reprobated the doctrine of toleration in terms which now appear to us overstrained and indefensible.

These unhappy contests about toleration created jealousies between the Parliament and the Presbyterian party, which ultimately issued in the overthrow of the covenanted cause in England; the Sectaries prevailed in defeating all the attempts of the Presbyterians to promote unity and peace; and the English Presbyterians fell in the noble but fruitless attempt to stem the torrent of errors and divisions which still overspread that country, and which, having found their way into Scotland, continue to distract our peace, to disgrace the cause of Protestantism, and to threaten the ruin of our national prosperity. So much for our not adhering to the Reformation so auspiciously begun, and violating that solemn compact by which the three nations were bound to prosecute it!

The Sectaries had their own opinion about the unity and peace offered them—unity and peace, but on what conditions! The Emperor of Russia offers the Poles unity and peace. And what shall be said of the demand made by the Presbyterians of Parliament “to arrest the current!” Was “the discipline of the Church, with full power to proceed against them [the Sectaries] according to the law of Christ,” not sufficient! What right had Parliament to interfere, if the Church had all the power! We waive the right which “the laws of Christ” gave to Presbyterians to proceed against other sects, or rather against all that were too weak to set them at defiance. It will be seen that Mr. McCreie is not one of those Presbyterian ministers who would “trinket” with Prelacy, like some of our most notable non-intrusionists.

These dry controversial crusts are not among the savoury morsels of the work. Its beauty, its interest, consists in being a sort of modernized Hind us Loose, and Cloud of Witnesses. It is a history of the troubles of Scotland, and of the noble resistance of the Covenanters, represented in pictures, and narrated in anecdotes, traditional, or found in their books; and sometimes, perhaps, not very carefully sifted; but full of character, and bearing the marks of truth and genuineness in the spirit, if not in the letter.

Scrivenor's History of the Iron Trade. 1 vol. 8vo. Smith, Elder, & Co.

A branch of national industry and commerce, of such vast importance to Great Britain as the iron trade, well merited a systematic history. Mr. Scrivenor's History is written with elaborate research and anxious care, and goes into and exhausts the entire subject. He imagines that the Britons first acquired a knowledge of iron from the Phœnicians, who came to Britain for tin, many centuries before the Romans invaded the island. The conjecture is not improbable. But not only is this a history of the British iron trade, but of that of every other State where iron is found and wrought;—France, Spain, Russia, Sweden and Norway, and the United States of America. The application of steam-power to the smelting of iron-ore, by rendering coal available, where previously only wood charcoal could be used with advantage, has wrought an amazing revolution in the trade.

The work is full of details and tables, and must be considered indispensable to every one connected with the trade; though it contains numerous curious facts besides the general history, which are full of interest to common readers. Specimens of these we should have liked to quote, had our space permitted.

The Book of the Bastiles; or, The History of the Working of the New Poor Law. By G. R. Wythen Baxter.

The author of this bulky volume has been an active agitator against the New Poor Law. He is, however, one of those writers whose scurrilous and flippant style of advocacy must injure any cause. In the administration of the New Poor Law there has been, we make no question, much harshness; and much hardship may have been experienced by its unfortunate objects. That the principle of the law is in many respects faulty, seems now to be generally admitted; as bit by bit it is in course of alteration; and must be much further modified. This volume requires the less notice, as the letters which it contains have all appeared in a London newspaper; and the rest of the Book of the Bastiles, much of it curious matter enough—painful or revolting as the revelations are—has been compiled from the newspapers. But one-half of it would have better served the purpose contemplated by the author. This is less a pity, than that so much of the original portion should have been written in a style of coarse invective, which will prevent many persons from reading what is really useful and commendable in it. What are the Tories now about to do with the Poor Law! To support Mr. Roebuck's motion, undoubtedly, in the first place, for the annihilation of those monsters, the Commissioners—that among other things, for it is not alone sufficient. And what next!

Ellen Braye; or, The Fortune-Teller: in 2 vols. Saunders & Otley.

It is not easy to describe this novel. It sets out like a juvenile moral tale—proceeds like a marvellous romance, and ends like a novel of fashionable life; corresponding with not one of the expectations it has raised.

Fortune-Telling is no longer one of the dangers against which society requires to be warned, but it is on fortune-telling that the moral of the latter part of the disjointed tale turns. It, moreover, outrages all probability; and yet it is readable enough, though a most unartist-like production.

Elements of Perspective Drawing. By Augustus Deacon. With Illustrative Plates.

A useful elementary work to students, and in schools where drawing is scientifically taught.

Proceedings of the General Anti-Slavery Convention, held in London, in June, 1840.

At present we merely announce this Report; but as it forms a bulky volume upon a subject of great interest to universal humanity, we propose to return to it, and to analyze the most important portion of its contents. This Convention was attended by deputies from different countries.

NEW POEMS AND DRAMAS.

Moore's Poetical Works. Volume X.

This work is now completed. The last volume has been eked out by the prose poem of "The Epicurean;" and its natural sequel, the poem of "Alciphron." A good many poems, which now first appear, are interwoven with "The Epicurean." As some space has been allotted to the muse of Moore in the preceding pages of this number of Tait, our present duty is limited to the externals of a work, than which, none more simply elegant is to be found among the literary bijouterie of drawing-room tables in the year 1841. And it must long occupy the same favoured station; sparkling on gilded brackets, nestling under silken cushions, lying on the lap of beauty and luxury; for when will there be another poet to push the author of Lalla Rookh, the Fudge Family, and the Irish Melodies, from his niche! There is yet another pretty frontispiece and vignette to this volume; but we had promised ourselves a portrait of the author instead, in the closing volume; and take leave to grumble, since pictorial embellishments were employed, that this only is wanting.

Original Poems and Songs. By James Lemon.

This is an humble west country bard; a region teeming with poetical artisans. His pieces are all of average merit; and a few of them sweet and tender, such as the Mother's Lament, and the lines on hearing a Robin singing. One poem of some length, entitled the Cottage, is pleasantly descriptive of Scottish rural manners. We like Mr. Lemon's choice of subjects: he has a "Lament of the Guardian Genius of the Loudon Family for the Death of Lady Flora Hastings;" and "Hardie and Baird's Lament after the Battle of Bonnymuir."

Recitations of the Pupils at Cave-House School.

A selection of pieces for a school exhibition; in which Master Heath spoke the Prologue, and obtained a silver medal; Master Goring recited the Butterfly's Ball; and Master Ray personated Sir James Graham, in a Parliamentary debate, very cleverly managed, and gained the gold medal. This is not very important to the world in general; though the collection of pieces affords teachers some good specimens for such exhibitions.

MARTINUZZI, A TRAGEDY. By George Stephens.—This persevering writer assails the public as the widow, in the Gospel, did the unjust judge. His importunity must succeed some time. No damnation damps him; and he does not want a certain kind of merit.

NAPOLEON PORTRAYED, AN EPIC POEM, in Six Cantos.—This should run—"To be published in six cantos," as the first only has appeared. Napoleon is no hero to this versifier.

POEMS from the German of WILHELM ZIMMERMAN, with ORIGINAL POEMS. By Aletes.—The translator—a young graduate of Oxford—accidentally met the German poet, whose works he has "done into English," at Tübingen. Zimmerman's poems are unknown in England, and Aletes considered them worthy of obtaining an English dress. The original pieces of the translator are of as much mark as the poems of Zimmerman.

THE FATE OF M'QUILLAN and O'NEILL'S DAUGHTER, with other Poems and Songs. By David Herbison; with a Memoir of the Author.—We have here an humble bard of the north of Ireland, who, by the advice of his literary friends and patrons, has been induced to collect his pieces into a volume, for the amusement of his friends and neighbours. David Herbison would be no great marvel among the tuneful hand-loom weavers of Scotland, but in Ireland he must be a prodigy; and, as such, we hope the good folks of Ulster will regard and encourage him. He deserves well of Scotland. He has written an elegy on Sir Walter Scott, and lines to the memory of James Hogg, who is moreover his favourite author. He admires Allan Ramsay more than Robert Burns; and if, on the whole, no great poet, he is certainly one of those men that Ireland would be the better for being in a condition to produce in much greater numbers.

THE STORM and OTHER POEMS. By Francis Bennoch.—This is a London publication; but the author must be either from the "north country" or from the north of Ireland. The volume contains several songs in the Scottish dialect, possessing considerable merit.

PERIODICAL AND SERIAL WORKS.

VOLUME IV. TYTLER'S HISTORY OF SCOTLAND.—The volume just issued contains the reigns of James the Second, Third, and Fourth. It abounds in incident and interest; these having been tumultuary reigns, when no king died in his bed. The Appendix, consisting of such Notes and Illustrations as are too long to be engrossed in the regular narrative, is not the least valuable portion of this History.

PART I. THE SONGS OF CHARLES DIBDIN, CHRONOLOGICALLY ARRANGED; with Notes, Historical and Critical, and the Music of the best and most popular Melodies.—This must be a good and desirable work to all true Englishmen. It is printed in the handsome style in which one likes to see an edition of a truly national and indeed a standard work. A Memoir is to be included in the last Part, by which time we shall have something to say of DIBDIN. Part I. has a well-engraved Portrait of the jovial and tender lyricist; for Dibdin was both.

VOLTAIRE'S HISTORY of CHARLES the TWELFTH. SMITH'S STANDARD LIBRARY.

LIFE and EXPLOITS of COMMODORE NAPIER, chiefly by Himself.—This is a pamphlet to serve the hour. The part of it contributed by Captain Napier, seems to be taken from the Gazette.

A DESCANT on the NEW POSTAGE LAW.—This is written by some blockhead of a Tory, who is indignant at the cheap postage, and who fancies himself vastly witty—a "mighty joker." Why may not those persons who despise the penny stamp be indulged with a shilling one to prove their superior gentility; as there are boxes at public places for "the better orders," and a cheap pit and gallery for the mobility; and first, second, and third class trains on railroads? By all means let those who consider the penny rate of postage low, be permitted to pay for their letters as before, only no saving the penny—no franking. This person, who is "out of trade," as he takes pains to inform us, is shocked at every knave now using an envelope like his betters; and cannot receive "a letter brought five hundred miles for a penny, without blushing."

THE LAW and PRACTICE relating to the CONSTITUTION and MANAGEMENT of ASSURANCES, BANKING, and other Joint Stock Companies. By Swinton Boulton, Secretary to the Liverpool Fire and Life Assurance Company.—This pamphlet suggests improvements worthy of consideration.

PRACTICAL SUGGESTIONS on CHURCH REFORM. By the Rev. Thomas Spencer, Perpetual Curate of Hinton.

REMONSTRANCE and WARNING against holding Communion with Ministers deposed by the General Assembly of the Church of Scotland, issued by order of the Assembly, by the late Moderator, Dr. Gordon.—An Anathema Maranatha—a Bull, or a broadside, directed against all those ministers who have sympathized, or may sympathize with their brethren, the deposed Strathbogie Ministers.

CORN LAW PAMPHLETS.

THE CORN LAWS of ENGLAND. By M. Von Raumer.—This is a voice from Prussia against the monstrous system existing in this country. The pamphlet is an intelligent and able one. It, however, contains nothing that is original to persons in this country conversant with the subject, but yet may be of much use, from showing what is thought of the Corn Laws by well-informed foreigners.

SECOND LETTER to the AGRICULTURISTS of the COUNTY of SALOP. By W. W. Whitmore, Esq.—An argument against the Corn Laws in the form of a dialogue.

THE CORN LAWS CONSIDERED in their ORIGIN, PROGRESS, and RESULTS; a good article, from the British and Foreign Quarterly, reprinted as a pamphlet.

POLITICAL REGISTER.

THE Tories are again fairly reinstated in power. The Cabinet is nearly the same as that of 1834, with the addition of Lord Stanley and Sir James Graham. On Friday, the 3d September, the late Ministers delivered up their seals of office at Claremont, and they were forthwith transferred to the new Ministry, who were in attendance. Both Houses assembled on Monday the 13th September, after an adjournment of a week to give time for the formation of the new Ministry. The Conservatives took their seats on the Ministerial side of the House, and the Whigs on the Opposition Benches. Of the policy of the new Ministry nothing has yet transpired. From a statement made by Sir Robert Peel on the 16th and 17th, it appears that he has not made up his mind what to do, and means to consider about it till next year. He stated that he is to adopt the estimates as framed by the late Ministry; that temporary provision must be made for the deficiency in the revenue, amounting to two-and-a-half millions; and that £80,000 or £90,000 would be required for warming and ventilating the new Houses of Parliament. The great difficulty is the deficiency of the revenue. A tax on incomes of three hundred a-year is talked of; but we do not think it is at all likely to pass, even were it proposed to Parliament. Doubling or trebling the penny postage is said also to be in contemplation. That is a measure, which, besides being exceedingly unpopular, would not yield probably half-a-million, for even the old rates of late years never produced a million and a half. We have little doubt that Sir Robert Peel regrets his opponents did not carry their measure for imposing an 8s. duty on wheat before resigning office. For instead of receiving only £75,000 for the million and a half of quarters which have recently been taken out of bond, £600,000 would have accrued from this single source. A few of the Liberals seem disposed to give the Tories a fair trial before adopting active measures of hostility; but the general opinion appears to be that they have been already sufficiently tried, and that no good or liberal measure is to be expected from them. With such a majority, however, as they possess in the House of Commons, (91,) joined to the absurd alarm the landowners and farmers generally entertain against a revision of the Corn Laws, we fear that the Tory tenure of office may be long protracted, notwithstanding the dislike of the Queen to that party; for the real Sovereign of this country is not the Queen, but the aristocracy; and her Majesty, as well as the people, must submit to whatever they choose to dictate, until a great extension of the suffrage shall take place,— of which extension, we confess, we see no prospect whatever. In consequence of the change of ministry, nearly twenty seats were vacated in the House of Commons; but notwithstanding the cry of reaction raised by the Whig Press, all the Ministers were re-elected with hardly the semblance of opposition. In their addresses and speeches, nothing came out as to the measures to be proposed. All will remain in doubt till February next. It is gratifying, however, to find that Lord Howick has secured a seat in Parliament. Alderman Thompson, the Tory member for Sunderland, having accepted the Chiltern Hundreds, in order that he might stand for Westmoreland, rendered vacant by Lord Lowther's promotion to the Peerage; the burgh was contested by Lord Howick and Mr. Woverley Attwood, when the latter was defeated by a majority of 714 to 453. The return of his lordship is a valuable accession to the Opposition side of the House; and we hope that the example of the electors of Sunderland, who now return two Liberals, will be followed throughout the country. At Bradford, a vacancy occurred by the death of Mr. Lister, a Liberal; the candidates were, Mr. Busfield, Whig, and Mr. Wilberforce, Tory: and the former was elected by 526 to 522.

ENGLAND.

COUNTY COURTS.—On the 27th August, a bill was introduced by the late Lord Chancellor, and read a first time, for remodelling the County Courts in England. At present the under sheriff presides over these courts, and he has been found in many instances unfit for the duty. It is therefore proposed to appoint 25 judges by the Lord Chancellor, with salaries varying from £800 to £1500,—all of them either to be barristers of seven, or attorneys of ten years' standing. The salaries appear to us to be too high, and the number of judges too small for so extensive, rich, and populous a country. We, in Scotland, have 48 sheriff-substitutes, and certainly not above two or three of them could be dispensed with, without inconvenience; besides justices of the peace, and magistrates of royal burghs. The judges of the English County Courts are to have summary jurisdiction in personal actions where the sum does not exceed £5;—when above that sum the plaintiff or defendant may call for a jury. This is as it ought to be;—trial by jury should never be resorted to without the consent of at least one of the parties.

THE SLIDING SCALE.—It appears very remarkable that the landed interest and farmers should be so much in favour of the sliding scale of corn duties, now that they have had so ample experience of its pernicious effects. By watching the fluctuations of the scale, the corn merchants pay a much smaller duty than ever was contemplated; for the average duty of the whole wheat entered for home consumption, since July 1828, when the sliding scale first came into operation, is only 6s. 9d., and the great proportion of it paid only 1s. In 1838, nearly three millions of quarters were entered at 1s.: in 1840, 630,000 were entered in one week at 2s. 8d. Now, what would have been thought, in 1828, when the existing law was under discussion, had it been proposed to impose a fixed duty of 5s. 9d. on foreign wheat? Assuredly, at that time, nothing less than 20s. would have been agreed to, as the avowed object was to keep the price of British wheat at 64s., and at that price the sliding scale exacts a duty of 23s. 8d. It is not, however, merely the amount of Foreign grain brought in at a low duty which is injurious to the farmer, but the period at which it has been entered for home consumption. This almost invariably happens immediately before or during harvest, and thus the farmers are exposed to a severe competition at the only period when they have grain for sale; for, in ordinary years, very little remains in their hands after March. Thus, between July 1828, and February 1829, 1,742,122 quarters of Foreign grain were entered, besides 186,851 cwt. of meal and flour; in September 1830, no less than 1,274,351 quarters of Foreign wheat, at a duty of 3s. 6d.; in the week ending 15th September 1838, nearly three million quarters at 1s.; in 1839, the chief entries were also in September; in September 1840, 630,000 quarters were entered at 2s. 8d.; and in September 1841, a million and a half of quarters were entered at 1s. Were the entries made during the summer, they would affect the corn speculators chiefly; but in harvest they have the effect of depressing prices during the whole winter and spring,—that is, during the whole period the farmers have anything to sell; so that there can be no doubt that the sliding scale, even if fairly wrought, is most pernicious to the farmer. But that the system is not fairly wrought, we believe every one is aware. In the July Number of this Magazine, the way in which the fictitious returns were made was explained. And the returns of the London market show clearly in what manner the "working of the averages," as it is technically called, is managed. In August 1838, the corn speculators, in order to enable them to get out of bond the Foreign wheat, which had been accumulating for some years, set about lowering the duty. In the week ending 11th August, it was 16s. 8d., but in the week ending 15th September, it was reduced to 1s. That this reduction was in a great measure fictitious, is apparent on the face of the returns. The total arrivals of British wheat in London, during the period, was 35,553 quarters, but the quantity returned as sold was 61,138 quarters. Then the prices quoted by factors, as actually obtainable in London, varied from 52s. to 76s.—the average being 62s. 7d.; the average of the fourth, or highest quality being 70s.; yet the average of all sorts of wheat returned by the corn speculators, was 71s.—8s. 5d. above what it ought to have been. Farther, to show that the returns were fictitious, we have only to look at the six weeks immediately after the fall of the duty to 1s. The arrivals are 30,161, and the sales, instead of being double, are very little more, viz. 32,708, and the price returned by the speculators was 3s. below the price of the best quality returned by the corn factors. The same thing took place in June, July, and August, last year, the arrivals being 90,286 and the sales 144,765; and the returns show exactly the same difference in price, and in the arrivals and sales previous to and after the reduction of duty as they did in 1838. It is plain, therefore, that the sliding scale is a tool which combining speculators can use for their own purposes, and the sooner it is got rid of the better.

THE CORN LAWS.—We are glad to observe that in all parts of the country Associations are forming for the Repeal of the Corn and Provision Laws. The conference at Manchester on the 17th August, at which nearly 700 clergymen attended, has given a great impetus to the movement. Since their return to their respective residences, they have been actively continuing the agitation by addresses to their congregations. The Anti-Bread Tax Circular has been, for the last week or two, filled with accounts of these addresses. Even the Chartists, who have hitherto opposed the repeal of the Corn Laws, finding by dear-bought experience the fallacy of the opinion that high-priced food makes high wages, have begun to associate for their repeal. It is remarkable indeed, that it has taken so long a time to open the eyes of the working-classes to the fact that the rate of wages depends solely on the supply and demand, and not on the price of provisions. Since 1836, the price of bread has doubled. It is now 2½d. a-pound in London and Edinburgh, yet wages are unquestionably much lower now than in 1836. A little calculation will prove that it is impossible wages can rise with prices. If the population of Great Britain be taken at eighteen millions, then at least two millions and a half must be operatives living on wages. Suppose the family of each consumes eight quatern loaves a-week, or 416 a-year, the whole quantity consumed will be 1040,000,000 quatern loaves. Now, a rise of 3d. a loaf would raise the price of this quantity of bread by thirteen millions sterling. Thus, to place the working classes of Britain in the same condition as they were in 1836, their employers must now pay them thirteen millions annually of additional wages. We ask any one, in whatever rank of life he may be placed, whether he believes that more money is paid in wages now than five years ago! Several important Corn Law Repeal meetings have been held in Manchester. At one of these, on the 16th September, a memorial to the Queen was agreed to, praying her Majesty not to prorogue the two Houses of Parliament until they have entered upon a full consideration of the Corn and Provision Laws. Were this example generally imitated, which there is every chance of its being, it would undoubtedly be attended with the most beneficial results.

THE £50 TENANTS-AT-WILL.—The pernicious effect of the clause introduced into the Reform Act by the Marquis of Chandos giving these tenants the franchise, is entitled to more consideration than it has hitherto obtained. In the Leeds Mercury of the 18th September, it is clearly proved that these tenants are the mere tools of the aristocracy, and that they invariably vote on the same side with their landlords. The counties of England and Wales have returned to the present Parliament 137 Tories and only 22 Reformers. In these counties, out of 479,657 voters, no fewer than 180,804, or two-fifths, are £50 occupiers; and it was solely owing to the voters of this class that Lord Milton and Lord Morpeth were defeated in the contest for the West Riding of Yorkshire at last election; for they had a majority of several hundreds when the £50 tenants are deducted. It would be desirable to ascertain whether the same cause has operated against the Liberal party in other counties. We suspect it must; for while the Tories in the English and Welsh counties are to the Whigs in the proportion of six to one, in the Scotch the proportion is only two to one. Mr. Hume, and the other Radical members gave their support to the Chandos clause, because it extended the suffrage; but the only effect of it is now shown to be to throw the county representation entirely into the hands of the aristocracy; for where Whig representatives are returned, it is only because Whig landowners predominate over Tory in the electoral district. We doubt if the Ballot would cure this evil; the only remedy is disfranchisement.

PROTECTION TO AGRICULTURE.—The effect of protecting agriculture by excluding foreign food, has been to prevent the advancement of the art. A small proportion only of the three kingdoms is properly cultivated; and even in the most advanced districts much has yet to be done. It is only within these few years that bones, rape-cake, and other manures, have been extensively used; and but a small portion of the arable land has yet been subjected to the system of tile, or frequent draining—one of the greatest improvements that has ever been introduced into agriculture. Deep-soil ploughing, so essential where there is a retentive sub-soil—and probably four-fifths of the land in the three kingdoms are in that situation—has hardly been tried by any one but its inventor, Mr. Smith. One of the great advantages likely to result from the repeal of the Corn Laws, would be to stimulate the farmers. At present a mode of cultivation, by which the produce is increased 50 or 100 per cent., may exist in one district for half a century, while the old defective method is followed in another not ten miles off. Thus, in many parts of England, turnips are sown broad cast, and the produce varies from five to fifteen tons an acre—the latter being reckoned a very good crop—while a good crop of drilled white turnips will produce from 25 to 30 tons. Mr. McCulloch calculates that England and Wales produce annually 12,350,000 quarters of wheat, and he estimates the average per acre at only 26 bushels; while in Northumberland, and the south eastern part of Scotland, 36 bushels is considered an indifferent crop, and 40 is quite common. There can be little doubt that the acreable produce could be raised as high in England as in Scotland; but, suppose it only raised from 26 to 32 bushels, we would be rendered quite independent of any foreign supply, for this would give us two millions and a half of additional quarters of wheat—a much greater quantity than that entered for home consumption in ordinary years. But, besides, by far too great a proportion of the land is allowed to remain in pasture; and much valuable soil is wasted from the frequency of small enclosures, sometimes not containing above an acre or two, surrounded with straggling and ill-kept hedges. Draining, the chief of agricultural improvements, and without which all others are futile, is hardly practised. Throughout the greater part of England, four horses are used often in ploughing the lightest soils, while the heaviest clay lands in Scotland are ploughed with two. The additional pair of horses, with their driver, cannot be put down at less than £60 a-year, and, in many cases, the money absolutely thrown away in this manner must be equal to the rent. What is it that causes so many and so rapid improvements in our manufactures, but the keen competition not only of the other manufacturers in this country, but of foreigners! How long could a manufacturer carry on business did he reject all recent improvement, and employ the same machinery that was in use half a century ago! Yet there is no doubt that the great body of English farmers cultivate the land in the same style their grandfathers did. One great advantage, in removing the prohibition against the importation of cattle and sheep, would be the improvement of our native breeds. The whole prosperity of New South Wales has arisen from the introduction of merino sheep; but these never could have been introduced had not George III. imported a few of that breed, in direct violation of the law, and from the royal stock Mr. McArthur obtained the sheep he carried with him to New South Wales. It is pretended that the provision laws must be kept up to indemnify the landowners for the exclusive burdens said to be imposed upon them. It has been again and again shown that they do not pay any exclusive taxes. For example—one that is often pointed out is the land tax. It seems to be forgotten that the inhabitants of towns pay land tax as well as the owners of land, and that the land tax was fixed, at the Union in 1707, at two millions for England, and £48,000 for Scotland, and has never been increased since, though rents have risen from ten to fifteen fold. But, besides, no person whose estate has been purchased since the Union, has any reason to complain of the land tax; for this, as well as all other burthens, are invariably taken into view in the purchase, and a corresponding deduction made from the price. The land tax paid by British land-owners is only a twenty-fifth part of the revenue,—a mere trifle compared with that of other countries. In Austria, out of thirteen millions of revenue, five are paid by the land tax. In France, twelve millions out of forty are raised in the same way. In Prussia, Denmark, and other continental states, from a third to a fourth of the whole revenue is raised by a direct tax on land. Yet in most of these states, the duty on grain imported is a mere trifle, and in not one of them is the importation of live cattle, sheep, &c., prohibited.

SCOTLAND.

HOLYROODHOUSE.—We are glad to observe that Mr. Black has brought under the notice of the Town Council the exorbitant charges made for exhibiting the apartments of Holyroodhouse. By the usual method of subdividing the labour of exhibition, and handing over the visitor from one to another, it is difficult to see the chief apartments for less than 10s. 6d. This is the more intolerable, because it appears from the "Report of the Committee of the Society for obtaining free admission to national monuments and public edifices," &c. &c., dated 24th June, 1840, of which committee Mr. Hume was chairman, that the Duke of Hamilton, in answer to a request by the chairman for the gratuitous admission of the public to Holyroodhouse, stated—"September 23, 1839,—I wrote to my deputy-keeper there, that I should never sanction the right of any demand for seeing the Abbey, and that no demand must be made, leaving to the discretion of those who visited the palace to act as they thought proper." This is, however, a very unsatisfactory footing on which to leave matters. It would be much better to exact a fixed fee of small amount; and we have little doubt that such a fee would be found more productive than the present exorbitant demand. The productiveness of small fees has been shown very clearly in the case of the Tower of London. In 1837, the fee was 2s.; there were 10,200 visitors that year; gross receipts, £1020. In 1838 it was reduced to 1s., and the number of visitors rose to 40,000; gross receipts, £2000. And from May 1839 to May 1840, the fee having been reduced to 6d., there were no fewer than 80,000 visitors, yielding double the receipts which the 2s. fee raised. It has been well ascertained that no danger is likely to arise to the objects exhibited from the greatest throng of visitors. The Palace of Hampton Court is now exhibited gratuitously, and it is visited by about 120,000 persons annually, the greater proportion on Sunday afternoon and Monday: and about the half of the whole number in July and August. The National Gallery was visited in 1839 by 397,000 persons. The Norwich Museum has had 6000 visitors a-day, principally of the lower orders, 500 being admitted at once, and remaining half-an-hour at a time; but neither in these nor in the numerous other instances of the gratuitous exhibitions of museums and paintings throughout England do we hear of any damage being done. But even where exhibitions have been opened gratuitously in Edinburgh, it has been thought necessary to throw impediments in the way. For example, an order of a Town Councillor must be had to see the collection of pictures by Sir William Erskine of Tory in the College; as if Sir William had left his pictures for the benefit of the Town Council and their friends, and not of the public generally. Tickets in like manner must be obtained to see the Regalia in the Castle; and there can be no doubt that these uncalled-for regulations have prevented many, especially of the lower classes, from seeing the pictures and regalia. We cannot close this subject without again pointing out the gross injustice perpetrated on the people of Edinburgh by their exclusion from the East Prince's Street Gardens. They were public property, or, at least, the public had numerous servitudes of road, bleaching clothes, and otherwise, over them, of which they could not be deprived. At the time they were shut up, it was always held out, that they were again to be opened up when the trees had got up a little; but we do not believe they will ever be opened, unless the Town Council be compelled to do so by a court of law.

RAILWAY FROM NEWCASTLE TO EDINBURGH.—We are glad to find that a Railway is likely to be made from England to Edinburgh, by the east coast. On the 7th of September, a meeting of the proprietors of the Great North of England Railway was held at Darlington, at which it was unanimously resolved to form a new Company, to issue shares to the extent of £500,000 to complete the line from Darlington to Newcastle. The original line was reported to be so expensive as to be almost impracticable. It has, therefore, been resolved to continue the line from Darlington to Shincliffe, near Durham, about 15 miles; from this point a line will be formed a little to the east for a distance of seven miles, where it will join the Stanhope and Brandling Junction Railways, which run to Gateshead on the south side of the Tyne, immediately opposite to Newcastle. Mr. Stephenson, the engineer, stated most confidently that the expense of the proposed line could not exceed nor even equal £20,000 a-mile, and that the works were such as might easily be executed within two years. It was stated, both in the Report of the Engineer and by several gentlemen at the meeting, that the extension of the Great North of England Railway to Newcastle decided the question whether the Railway communication with Scotland was to take place by the east or west coast. The line by the east coast is much less expensive than that by the west; but, considering the activity and influence of those interested in the west line, we think it is time that the people of Edinburgh and of the districts likely to be benefited by the east line should bestir themselves a little more than they have hitherto done. It is obvious that not more than one communication by Railway with Scotland is likely to be formed or a great number of years; so that the formation of one line must, in the meantime, be the exclusion of every other.

IRELAND.

The change of Ministry has created great dissatisfaction in Ireland. Both Liberals and Tories are disgusted with the new Cabinet, and both vexed that so few of the loaves and fishes have fallen to Irishmen. Nothing but the Repeal of the Union is now talked of. The Repeal Association meets on Monday of each week. In order to keep within the law, their mode of action is to be by petition. A committee has already been appointed to draw up a petition for the Repeal of the Union. Petitions for the amendment of the Corporation Reform Bill, for an extension of the Franchise, for the enlargement of the Representation, and for the abolition of the Tithe-Rent Charge, are to follow in succession. Not a single week is to pass without petitioning. But O'Connell adds,—to make the Repeal successful, that he must have five millions of Repealers enrolled in the Association. This shows that he expects the whole agitation will go for nothing; for he knows he will never get five millions of Repealers.

FOREIGN.

FRANCE.—There have been disturbances at Toulon, and many other places in France, for which the taking of a census is given as the pretext. At Clermont-Ferrand, rebellious movements took place on the 9th and 10th of September. Barricades were erected, the military fired on, and the émeute was not put down without considerable bloodshed on both sides. On the night of Sunday the 12th, cries of "Down with Louis Philippe,—down with Guizot," were heard in various parts of Paris; and next day, as the Dukes of Orleans, Nemours, and d'Aumale, the king's three sons, were riding at the head of the 17th Regiment of foot, (of which the Duke d'Aumale is colonel,) and had reached the Faubourg St. Antoine, a man presented himself with two pistols, and fired at the Dukes. Only one of the pistols went off. The ball missed the Dukes, but severely wounded the horse of Colonel Le Vaillant. The assassin was immediately arrested. His name is Nicholas Pappart, a journeyman sawyer, born in the district of the Vosges, but resident for the last three years in Paris. He has been remitted to the chamber of peers for trial. It would have been much better to have tried him before the lowest court, having competent jurisdiction, and instead of a capital sentence, which will in all probability be pronounced, to sentence him to the galleys for life. In the morbid state of feeling at present existing among the French, the notoriety and éclat which trials before the peers and capital sentences confer is perhaps the inducement to the frequent attempts to commit assassination, for Pappart could hardly expect to escape whether he succeeded in his attempt or not.

CHINA.—Accounts from Macao to the 10th of May have been received. Captain Elliot seems to be doing little or nothing, in as far as warlike operations are concerned: but notwithstanding the threats, and even orders given by the Emperor of China, to burn all the tea, Captain Elliot succeeded in getting 11,000,000 lbs. shipped, and it was supposed that an equal quantity would be secured by the end of May. This news has had the effect of depressing the price of tea in this country. Indignant at the capture of the forts of Bocca Tigris, the Emperor had ordered Keshen, the late imperial commissioner, to be put to death. The Chinese army in the neighbourhood of Canton was rapidly increasing, and, on the other hand, active preparations for continuing the warfare were going on in India. Unless a blow can be struck at Peking, it is not at all unlikely that this dispute may be protracted for years. It is evident that no progress towards its settlement has yet been made.

AMERICA.—Contrary to all expectation, the President of the United States has vetoed the bill for the establishment of a State Bank. This has created great surprise; for the late President Harrison was elected owing almost entirely to his being favourable to the institution of a State Bank.

TRADE AND MANUFACTURES.—Owing to the shortness of the stock and the demand for Winter goods, trade has been rather brisker for the last few weeks, but still the greatest distress prevails. The following account of Stockport may be considered as a picture of the state of manufacturing towns in general. By the last census the population was 50,495, being 8000 less than in 1831; of 10,890 houses, shops, and taverns, 2053 are unoccupied, and another fifth may be set down as occupied, but paying no rent; twelve mills have stopped working, six are only partially employed, and 2750 persons are totally idle and without the means of subsistence. Those who are employed only work four days a-week, and the best weaver cannot earn above 10s. a week. There are 7000 hand-loom weavers in Manchester, of these one-third are entirely without employment, another third are only partially employed, and the utmost earnings of these in full work do not exceed 7s. a week. At Worcester the condition of the poor is stated to be more gloomy than ever. At Dudley a great number of iron furnaces have been blown out; the coal-miners, in consequence, are employed only three or four days a-week, and their wages have been reduced from 3s. to 2s. 9d. a-day. At Liverpool and Manchester there have been numerous failures. In the former town, one house has failed for £400,000; and the liabilities of the Houses which have stopped payment in both towns, within these few weeks, considerably exceed a million. Owing to speculations in the Tea Trade, there have also, more recently, been several bankruptcies in London, and more are anticipated. The distressed condition of the operatives is shown by the diminished consumption of articles of food. The number of sheep required for the Iron Works between Abergavenny and Cardiff, in Wales, is 2000 a-week less than it was twelve months ago: there is also a great decrease in the sale of beef and veal; the workmen refusing to give more than 4½d. a-pound. Although the price of Raw Sugar has fallen from 57s. 3d. to 34s. 9d. a cwt., exclusive of duty, in comparing the first six months of 1840 with the corresponding period in 1841, it will be found that the consumption has fallen off one-third; arising from the diminished means of the people to purchase it from want of employment, and the high prices of other necessities of life.

AGRICULTURE.

The accounts of the crops are so contradictory, that it is difficult to draw any conclusion as to their productiveness, compared with ordinary years. In East Lothian, the barley and turnips are very deficient, and part of the wheat has suffered from mildew and lodging. In Dumfriesshire the turnips are very backward, and will likely turn out a very inferior crop, unless the weather continue unusually dry and warm. In most of the parishes round Dumfries, there is the promise of a fair average grain crop. In the county of Edinburgh, the same report may be made; and the turnip crop being in general earlier sown than in other districts, may be expected to yield a full average return. Potatoes, of which a great breadth is now planted in this county, are most luxuriant, and nothing but a few weeks' dry weather, without frost, is wanted to produce an abundant supply. In the low districts of Scotland, the great proportion of the grain was cut by the middle of September, but owing to the unsettled state of the weather, very little of it was carried. In the neighbourhood of Leeds the wheat has partially suffered from mildew and rust: but with favourable weather it was expected, "that the average produce of this year's crop will at least equal, and perhaps exceed, any of the three years by which it was preceded." Warrick.—In some places, the wheat is ripening a good colour, but the greater part is dark, and more or less blighted. Exeter.—The barley is, in general, a good crop. Northallerton.—The crops are very good. Hants.—The harvest is progressing satisfactorily, and promises a fair average, both in quantity and quality. Durham.—The wheat is a superior sample, and will approach an average crop, though in some parts there is a slight blight. Oats are not so good. On light lands they are both thin on the ground and short in the straw. Turnips and potatoes are a very heavy crop. Doncaster.—The opinion gathers strength that, on the whole, the crops are likely to be found above an average. Messrs. Sturge of Birmingham, in their Monthly Circular, state that the yield of the wheat crop is generally complained of. They calculate that about a million and a half of foreign wheat and flour will be liberated at the 1s. duty, and that much more will be required before another harvest. The quantity of old wheat in the hands of the farmer is less than since the same period in 1833. They report that the barley crop, both in quantity and quality, is inferior to that of last year. The Mark Lane Express fears, from the very many complaints from all parts of the kingdom respecting the quality and weight of the new wheat, that a large portion of it will prove inferior to the crop of 1840; and it is apprehended that the yield will also be short. It is not therefore expected that the price of good wheat will permanently fall under the present point, although the large quantity of foreign wheat now thrown on the market will probably depress markets for a few weeks. In Ireland the crops are very backward, and have suffered much from rain.

The price of butcher meat, notwithstanding the distress in the manufacturing districts, still keeps up. In the Edinburgh market, the best beef cannot be had under 7d. to 8d., and mutton from 6d. to 7d. a lb.; lamb, 1s. 6d. to 4s. 6d. a quarter. At Falkirk Second Tryst, held on the 13th and 14th September, twenty short-horned cattle, picked from a lot of forty-six, fed in East Lothian, brought £27 each, the weight being about fifty Dutch stones. Another lot of the Angus-shire breed, weight about forty-four Dutch stones, brought £21. The West Highland breed brought, stots, £6 : 6s.; queys, £5 to £5 : 10s.; 1000 Cheviot widders were sold for £1 : 11s. each; 1100 white-faced ewes realized 18s. a-head; and black-faced widders from 20s. to 23s. 6d. Nearly the whole sheep were sold the first day. The demand for wool continues steady, but there is no appearance of a rise in price.

SHELLEY.

(Concluded from our October No.)

CHAPTER IV.

Cenci. Revolt of Islam. Prometheus Unbound. Abstract of that drama, which is founded on an ancient belief in the perfectibility of mankind. This creed governed Shelley powerfully throughout his life, as well as his poetry.

"THE Revolt of Islam," first called "Laon and Cythna," the "Prometheus Unbound" and "Cenci," were all, it appears, from Shelley's Memoirs in Galignani's edition, the production of one year, and they are the principal poems of the author. In writing these he had the inspiration of the great moral and intellectual Truths which they are intended to evolve; and having once embodied these theoretic, and to him actuating truths, he had accomplished the greatest purpose of his being. "Hellas," "Rosalind and Helen," "The Witch of Atlas," "Epipsychidion," and his other poems, are reiterations of sectional parts of the schemes of these two first works, both in point of time and genius. Poetry in the hands of Shelley was a spirit,—not one whose visitations are only charming glimpses of her own beauty, but a spirit summoned to abide, and to make revelations of the world unseen. The faculties of Fancy, Imagination, Reason, were to him only the tools to work out a completer fabric than themselves. And this it is that makes the Poetry of Shelley, with its weaknesses as well as its power, the most perfect monument of the age. His comprehension took in the most primitive condition of the world, before the creation which we, a part of it, suffer and enjoy, before the Titans had invaded the gods; and extended forward to changes as great, which would terminate the struggle now presented by the history of the race. He interprets the voice of the mountains—

Thrice three hundred thousand years
O'er the earthquake's couch we stood, and plunges into futurity—

When recorded time,
Even all that we imagine, age on age,
Seems but a point, and the reluctant mind
Flags wearily in its unending flight.

This cycle he is constantly spanning in theory, and stands as it were on the isthmus between two continents, not only of time, but of moral condition. The present time has been called by a French writer the culminating point of Philosophy. The transition from impulse to deliberation, from precedents to principles, from might to right; popularly so understood, has for half a century been the deep-rooted cause of social misunderstanding and political contention. This it is which Shelley's poetry exhibits to us.

As it is the tendency of poetic writings and their influence, more than criticism on particular poems, which employs us in these pages, the tragedy of "Cenci" is not so important to be at present considered. It is one of the most admirable specimens of sustained tragedy in the language, filled with passions described as only a mind who made the wrongs of others his own, can describe them. But the character of Count Cenci is one beneath all sympathy but that of horror, and goes far to make us think the rack and wheel may have had a propriety in their application sometimes. To feel this for a moment, even to have the possibility of such evil natures really existing presented to us, is offensive; while the crime on which the plot hinges is also not to be contemplated.

The character of Beatrice indeed would redeem any composition, and the delight in contemplating it be a sufficient reward for bearing with the recital of any narrative. This character it was that alone induced Shelley to undertake the subject, and to illustrate, in a form sufficiently powerful, the tyranny of parental authority. In the "Prometheus Unbound," the whole scheme of his philosophy, the cosmogony of his world of intellect, is described, and in this respect as well as because it contains his finest poetry, it demands the most attention. We shall endeavour to give in as few words as possible an abstract of this Lyrical Drama.

"The silence of the earliest antiquity was succeeded by poetical fables," says Bacon, "and these, at length, by the writings we now enjoy: so that the concealed and secret learning of the ancients seems separated from the history and knowledge of the following ages, by a veil, or partition wall of fables, interposing between the things that are lost, and those that remain. These fables by no means appear to have been invented by the persons who relate and divulge them; whether Homer, Hesiod, or others; if I were assured that they first flowed from those later times and authors that transmit them to us, I should never expect anything singularly great or noble from such an origin. But whoever attentively considers the thing, will find that these fables are delivered down, and related by, those writers, not as matters then first invented and proposed, but as things received and embraced in earlier ages. Besides, as they are differently related by writers nearly of the same age, it is easily perceived that the relaters drew from the common stock of ancient tradition, and varied but in point of embellishment, which is their own. And this principally raises my esteem of these fables, which I receive, not as the product of the age, or invention of the poets, but as sacred relics, gentle whispers, and the breath of better times, that from the traditions of more ancient nations came, at length, into the flutes and trumpets of the Greeks."

Thus it is that these fables are as young now as three thousand years ago, and as much adapted to poetic purposes as then. "The Greek tragic writers employed in the treatment of their mythology a certain arbitrary discretion," and this discretion Shelley has exercised in Prometheus Unbound: which aspires to complete the trilogy of Æschylus on the subject of that demigod, and to be one of the "Attic tragedies of stateliest and most regal argument:" Nay, more than one of those; having the superior morality which Christianity and the knowledge of our higher informed age united to the beauty of ancient art and the dignity of their philosophy. "We shall do well," says Schlegel, in an often quoted passage, "always to think of these tragic poems in conjunction with ancient sculpture; and perhaps the most faithful representation of them is to consider them as living and moving statues of the highest order." No reproduction of these however, no adaptation of their machinery to such uses as a poet of our times can have in view, can be so considered. The picture, as it has been observed, is more characteristic of the modern; and it seems impossible for us ever to enjoy such abstractions as deny warmth—vitality; although we are ready to embrace those of a transcendent humanity. And such a difference as this we feel in turning from the ancient poet's Prometheus Bound to the Unbound of the modern. With a spirit and a heart filled with all that is good in these days, and hoping all that could accrue from that goodness, Shelley looked back with love on the Pantheon of the Greeks, because there he saw the heart and the life of man made the ultimate object. He knew we had passed beyond every tenet peculiar either to their theology or morality; but he thought we had passed further than we have—that we could now lay down the concentrative Unity which followed the dissolution of that Pantheon, and the Reverence which has taught us so much; and arrive at a contentment equally removed from the potential and trusting faith of Christianity, which has raised us to so high a pitch, and from the supine dissipation and worship of dead matter and its properties, of ancient pantheists. We may quote in support of this the opening of Alastor, where he addresses the elements and the productive power of nature—the magna mater, of whom the oracle of Themis told Deucalion and Pyrrha after the deluge; desiring them to cast stones behind them, and leave the repeopling of the world to her. "Nature and the mysteries," a phrase which occurs in a German critic, would have been understood by the ancients very differently from the sense in which he uses it.

Earth, ocean, air, beloved brotherhood!
If our great Mother has embued my soul
With aught of natural piety to feel
Your love, and recompense the boon with mine—
If dewy morn, and odorous noon, and even,
With sunset and its gorgeous ministers,
And solemn midnight's tingling silentness;
If Autumn's hollow sighs in the sere wood,
And Winter robing with pure snow and crowns
Of starry ice the gray grass and bare boughs;
If Spring's voluptuous pantings when she breathes
Her first sweet kisses, have been dear to me;
If no bright bird, insect, or gentle beast
I consciously have injured, but still loved
And cheriah'd these my kindred;—then forgive
This boast, beloved brethren, and withdraw
No portion of your wonted favour now!

Mother of this unfathomable world!
Favour my solemn song, for I have loved
Thee ever, and thee only; I have watch'd
Thy shadow, and the darkness of thy steps,
And my heart ever gazes on the depth
Of thy deep mysteries.

The argument of "Prometheus Unbound" is this: At first there existed Heaven and Earth (Ouranus and Gaia, according to Hesiod, the first pair) and Light and Love: and under the sway of Saturn (with whom time began) the primitive men enjoyed a happy life. But he refused them Knowledge. Then Prometheus, the son of Earth, who is the indomitable Will of man to attain Truth, gave wisdom, which is power, to Jupiter, who is the Law of necessity compelling into submission the mind of man to the bonds of his physical nature—on condition of his rendering in return that man shall be free. Prometheus the Good, by requiring the knowledge of good and evil, became the prey to Jupiter the Evil, and a warfare was begun between them. The ages pass on; the poetic beings of the elements and all the gods, his family, are subject to Jupiter. He reigns supreme, except the proud Spirit of Man, who is chained by him, but not subdued; and Demogorgon (who in this fable is difficult beyond extrication, if he be not the Future) sitting apart unmoving and wrapt in tenfold darkness. Time, as it passes, brings down innumerable curses on the race of Prometheus,—famine, toil, disease, strife, and death, till then unknown. Prometheus continues calm, and sends the immortal Hesperes, to hide with thin and rainbow wings the shape of Death, and causes Love to bind up the disunited tendrils of the heart. And he invented fire to counter-work the curses on the seasons; and he strengthened the hands of his race with iron and gold, to resist the oppression of dead nature: and he taught them speech: but still their pains continued.

"Ah, me! alas! pain, pain ever, for ever!" cries the man Prometheus, uttering his interminable misery in a wonderful line that seems eternal:

No change, no pause, no hope! yet I endure.
I ask the Earth, have not the mountains felt?
I ask yon Heaven, the all-beholding Sun,
Has it not seen! The Sea, in storm or calm,
Heaven's ever-changing shadow, spread below,
Have its deaf waves not heard my agony!
Ah, me! alas, pain, pain ever, for ever!

And with these and like lamentations, stupendous in their imagery and marvellous in rhythm, this great drama opens. The voices of the Mountains, and Springs, and Air, and Whirlwinds, speak, and the Earth consoles him. He scarcely hears them; and asks the venerable voice of his mother Earth, to repeat to him the curse with which he defied the god Jupiter. She dares not, but desires him to call up from the land of shadow, some shade to speak what, living, she may not; and he evokes the shade of him at whom the curse was launched. The shadow of Jupiter is evoked from the land of shadows; which shows us the origin of that fine imagination in Byron's "Cain," where Lucifer shows him the ghosts of past things, and which altogether had not the appearance of being an invention of his own. "Cain" was written while Byron and Shelley were in daily intercourse.

The confiding sea-nymphs, the Oceanides, who have remained tending on Prometheus, cower down while the phantom speaks, and while a cloud of Furies, sent to aggravate the Titan, perform their work. A fearful and awful task is theirs; to show him the evils which the world groans under, and add to his despair, by pictures of the miseries of his race. The war which has always been maintained between the enthralling and the enthralled, is raised in visions of blood and fire before him; and then an emblem succeeds and in the throes of whose agony the spirit of Prometheus bows in pity and horror.

A youth
With patient looks nailed to a crucifix;

Worse things unheard, unseen, remain behind.

But the pity of the Titan scares the Furies whose office it is to summon them. Fair spirits succeed, and fill the air, their dwelling-place, with music; which leads Prometheus to think of joy once more, and of Asia, from whom he had been so long and so far separated. Asia lingers in a lonely vale, the spirit of enjoyment desolated, and, it may be, the emblem of that continent to which man seems to have been indigenous, and which has been the most irretrievably alienated from truth. Panthea, whose name may afford some clue to her nature, leaves her watching by the Titan to revisit the exiled Asia, who awaits with anxious eyes her advent: and the meeting is as beautiful as the idea.

Hear I not
The Æolian music of her sea-green plumes
Winnowing the crimson dawn!

Asia asks, as her sister arrives filled with faint recollections of two prophet-dreams which have visited her, and one of which, as she relates, passes through the air, crying, "Follow, follow!" and Asia, too, has had a dream which bade her "follow," and echo answers, "follow, follow!" and they hasten after the wandering sound, over the peaks of the world, to the realm of Demogorgon.

To the deep, to the deep,
Down, down!

Through the shade of sleep,
Through the cloudy strife
Of Death and of Life;
Through the veil and the bar
Of things which seem and are,
Even to the steps of the remotest throne,
Down, down!

Through the gray, void abyss,
Down, down!
Where the air is no prism,
And the moon and stars are not,
And the cavern-crag wear not
The radiance of Heaven,
Nor the gloom to Earth given,
Where there is one pervading, one alone.
Down, down!

In the depth of the deep,
Down, down!

Like veil'd lightning asleep,
Like the spark nursed in embers,
The last look Love remembers,
Like a diamond which shines
On the dark wealth of mines,
A spell is treasured but for thee alone.
Down, down!

We have bound thee, we guide thee;
Down, down!
With the bright form beside thee;
Resist not the weakness,
Such strength is in meekness,
That the Eternal, the Immortal,
Must unclose through life's portal,
The snake-like doom coil'd underneath his throne,
By that alone.

They gaze upon the veiled Form, and question the mighty darkness.

ASIA. Prometheus shall arise
Henceforth the sun of this rejoicing world:
When shall the destined hour arrive!

DEMOGORGON. Behold!

ASIA. The rocks are cleft, and through the purple night

I see cars drawn by rainbow-winged steeds
Which trample the dim winds: in each there stands
A wild-eyed charioteer urging their flight.
Some look behind, as fiends pursued them there,
And yet I see no shapes but the keen stars:
Others, with burning eyes, lean forth, and drink
With eager lips the wind of their own speed,
As if the thing they loved fled on before,
And now—even now they clasp'd it. Their bright looks Stream like a comet's flashing hair: they all Sweep onward.

DEMOGORGON. These are the immortal hours
Of whom thou did'st demand. One waits for thee.

A charioteer, with a fearful countenance, beckons Asia to ascend, and another, with dove-like eyes, raises Panthea into her ivory shell, while the awful Phantom ascends from his ebony throne. The car arrives in Heaven, Demogorgon advances, and Jupiter, the Ruler, falls. Prometheus hears and rejoices, and Hercules unbinds his chains: the yoke of evil is shaken off, and Earth fades into death, as her immortal son and fair daughters, with great acclamation, and heralded by a spirit, in the likeness of a winged child, fly beyond Bacchic, Nysa, and Indus, to a temple and a cave which once bore

Thy name, Prometheus; there the emulous youths
Bore to thy honour through the divine gloom
The lamp which was thine emblem; even as those Who bear the untransmitted torch of hope
Into the grave, across the night of life,
As thou hast borne it most triumphantly
To this far goal of Time. Depart, farewell.
Beside that temple is the destined cave.

The spirit which guides them is the Delicate spirit

That guides the earth through heaven.

And as they alight, the Earth, now a new-born child-spirit, advances to them, and unbounded love fills all existences, and makes perpetual joy. The Spirit of the Hour recounts the changes on the world which he has seen, and how he has left men subjecting all passion, chance, and death, and all that clogs the soul

Which else might over-soar
The loftiest star of unascended heaven,
Pinnacled dim in the intense inane.

The last act opens, when the main action is thus finished by Choruses bearing Time to his tomb in eternity, and the Earth and the Moon hold converse, and Demogorgon, who succeeds Jupiter as he succeeded Saturn, addresses thus the various beings that now exult in new life, and concludes the poem.

This is the day which down the void abysm,
At the Earth-born's spell yawns for Heaven's despotism,
And conquest is dragg'd captive through the deep;
Love from its awful throne of patient power
In the wise heart, from the last giddy hour
Of dead endurance, from the slippery, steep,
And narrow verge of crag-like agony, springs
And folds over the world its healing wings.

Gentleness, Virtue, Wisdom, and Endurance,
These are the seals of that most firm assurance
Which bars the pit over Destruction's strength;
And if with infirm hand, Eternity,
Mother of many acts and hours, should free
The serpent that would clasp her with his length;
These are the spells by which to reassume
An empire o'er the disentangled doom.

To suffer woes which Hope thinks infinite;
To forgive wrongs darker than death or night;
To defy power, which seems omnipotent;
To love and bear; to hope till Hope creates
From its own wreck the thing it contemplates;
Neither to change, nor flatter, nor repent;
This, like thy glory, Titan! is to be Good, great, and joyous, beautiful and free:
This is alone Life, Joy, Empire, and Victory!

Such is the grand scheme of the poem, which, however, is liable to other interpretations, according to the opinions of the critic. What the land beyond the Indus may be, where the Temple and Cavern are, and in which the spirit of the Earth only can appear, is a question. And yet this has been one of his favourite types; and the termination of "The Revolt of Islam" exhibits a similar difficulty. When Laon and Cythna have failed in their struggles for the freedom of the world, and suffered for their rectitude, when the throes of death are over, they are piloted by "a child with silver-shining wings" in a boat of hollow pearl. Cythna perceives the child to be her own, and the land to which they hasten is the Temple of the Spirit. The Apocatastasis, or year of the Pythagoreans, was a period of 15,000 years, during which the nature which had fallen from primal happiness regained that state. The fable of Shelley's Prometheus is the latter part of that Pythagorean cycle. In a dialogue attributed to Hermes Trismegistes, the degeneration of man is described, and the cessation of every divine voice, and the Prophetic rhapsody terminates by recalling the ancient order. This is to be effected, according to this ancient monument, by evils, deluge, disease; but the result of all is, "the renovation of all good things, and the most holy and religious restitution of the nature of them. This is the geniture of the world, in order that the world itself may appear an adorable and admirable production." There is no part of the fable that has not immediate reference to the visible diurnal sphere, and the physical nature of man. And also in Godwin's "Political Justice," a book which his son-in-law acknowledged as having in great measure framed his opinions; in that bold conjecture of ultimate happiness, and entire subjection of the causes of pain to the mind and Will of man, the theatre is strictly that of our present struggle.

It is this renovation of the ancient sage which our poet deals with. Then how are we to explain that other land of Spirit, to which the perfected nature hastens? This can only be done by supposing he intended the change from the life which is between pain and pleasure, a conscious torture, to that which is reason and unconscious joy—a change so great that the earth itself shall be also changed, and nature be no longer the same. Nor is it strange that a difficulty should terminate this invention: although one of the grandest which modern philosophy has built upon the broad and firm basis of the wise fable of the Greeks. But such an interpretation as we have given is alone compatible with the spirit of the poem. Will a time ever arrive when men will not only know, but will altogether be governed by, the perfect rule of equity with no desire unattained, no happiness but that of sympathy? Such a moral condition it was that Shelley desired, that this poem foreshows, that his life was spent in toiling for and hoping, and for the accomplishment of which he has done much. If such a time can never be on the world, his advent is another surety that the nature of man yearns after and is elsewhere destined for more perfect conditions than those he now enjoys. But the spirit of inquiry and of change, which goes on with increased acceleration from age to age, proceeds on the supposition, (whether instinctive or expressed,) of such perfectibility being no dream; and Shelley's life, and the lives of many thousands since the end of last century, have been sacrificed to the belief.

Sage follows sage afar;
Dark lapse of time between, now marked alone
By their advent.

As star by star arises on the night,
Up through the shades of time past they appear
Like lambent haloes burning steadily
A thousand ages still unquenchable.
Progressing onward, the eternal wheel
Circles; and still a track from those high flames
God kindled, follows on. Another flame

Subtle as lightning
Is added to their brightening.

Still sage shall follow sage,
And still the light doth thicken to the dawn;
Redness of morn

Gilds now our horizon! Alastor, thou
Shalt be aurora to the unknown time:
And we will bind upon thy name beloved,
The laurel, the soft olive, and the rose,
And poppy, and the graceful ivy plant;
Glow-worms shall gather with their tiny lamps,
And thou shalt nourish them who wast so rich.

And when our chains we burst,
We'll say—"Alastor, thou wast first!"

Such is one character of Shelley, and such one definition of the scope of his poetry. It is a high character and a wide sphere, in the light we have drawn it, the highest and the amplest; and yet in another it is but a fearful moral mistake and a dream. There is a medal of Julius Cæsar, having on one side the head of that self-aggrandizing conqueror and destroyer of nations, whose life and consequent death opened a new epoch of Roman freedom; and on the other Æneas, bearing on his shoulder his aged father, and in his hand his household gods, with veneration rescuing the remaining life of the old and feeble, and saving from oblivion a useless symbol of faith, because obeying the dictates of nature: on one side the innovator, on the other the preserver. Those who admire the last picture, will hate the first; and Shelley's life was without this gracious obverse: he had no country, no Anchises, no Ascanius, no household gods.

The power of the law is the guarantee of our liberties, the dominion of law constitutes, indeed, our national and social freedom: and yet Shelley would have thrown it down, nor left one precedent remaining upon another. And why? Because all law is imposition: it is a setting up of a coercive rule for a community, when nature has made men individuals, and implanted in each man a love for himself. Social justice is the insurance of property, and yet Shelley would not have respected the right of possession. And why? Because there is an ulterior justice, a prior right, which men possess as animals, which knows nothing of personal property. He was wrong in thinking we could shake off the great fabric of institutions, which insures the peace and understanding of society, and recur to the primitive conscience and right of nature; and he was wrong also in imagining that the world was subjected by force to the rule of these conventions. It has been the masses of mankind who have imposed them on themselves, and will always love them. There are also "deux formes de la vérité, le mystère et l'exposition scientifique." Philosophy overshadows the land in the simple form of religion and of worship; Shelley did not perceive or acknowledge this double form of truth; he did not admit that law was freedom, or that justice protected individual rights; he was pertinaciously one-sided. Then why have we placed him so high as a philosophic poet? Just because he stands for the assertor of those primal catholic and blind principles—because he is, more than all the others, thoroughly identified with the spirit of the age; and not the less so that he was almost a child, an enthusiast, a simple-minded martyr, whose will was the most powerful impulse within him. Moreover, if we believe the reviews, every book of poetry which appears is more or less impregnated with his spirit and style; a spirit and style which never can be, nor perhaps ought we to desire that it should be, popular.

THE STUDENT-LIFE OF GERMANY.*

MR. HOWITT would have done Dr. Cornelius service had he cut down his manuscripts at least a full half before presenting them in an English dress. The work, considering the nature of the subject, must be quite enough for Germany; and certainly far too much for England. The theme has failed the author; and tale, anecdote, and many matters even less relevant, are pressed into the service, to eke out the bulky volume. We do not object to the National, and the Burschen songs, as these constitute the finest part of the work. Yet, had Dr. Cornelius known how very familiar in many beautiful translations are the Sword Song, the German Fatherland, and others, in England, he could scarce have thought of serving them up once more. Even the Music, the genuine, original melodies, to which those stirring effusions are enthusiastically poured forth, must be well known through our own pages; yet the music is the best original feature of the work.

We are not sure that it would be easy to make a popular voluminous book out of the Town and Gown life of the Oxford gentlemen, and of their customs and usages. A much more generally interesting work might be made from the customs and usages of the crafts and guilds of our towns, the chapels of the printers, and the antiquities of the bold city 'prentices; and yet each of these themes would require to be handled with brevity and discretion; how much more the student-life of Germany!

If Mr. Howitt has selected this work for translation, we must think that, after what he has seen in the Westminster Review, and in Tait's Magazine, of Burschen life and Burschen song, he has made an ill choice. Had he resided in Heidelberg for a few months, or better still, years longer, he could have given us a much more attractive and suitable view of student-life himself; and one which would abundantly have satisfied any rational curiosity that can longer be felt on the subject.

How would the reading-public, at this day, receive a history of all the absurdities of free-masonry? Yet the institutions of masonry are more imposing, and embrace a much wider range of interests and sympathies than the mummeries of the student-life of Germany. Masonry has, like student-life, its ceremonial, its songs, and its associations; and it is less likely to prove injurious to the initiated than the tom-foolery, the swagger, real or affected, and the devil-may-careism of Burschenschaft. The student-life of Germany is happily becoming a much more rational life than can be augured from many of the puerile and extravagant customs here described, and which are well-nigh exploded; so that the one half or the third part of the contents, well-selected, might have made an amusing volume. And now we proceed to examine its better part.

* Translated from the MSS. of Dr. Cornelius of Heidelberg, by William Howitt. 1 vol. large octavo, with Music, and numerous Illustrative Plates, and Vignettes. pp. 484. London: Longman, Brown, Green, & Longmans.]

It is diverting to find "Friend William" dexterously trimming, in his preface, between the sense-of propriety people, the rigid sticklers for decorum in manners and discipline in youth, and the wild, lawless, eccentric, or reckless Bursch; deprecating the just censures of the one, and propitiating the other, by an extravagant strain of compliment to their bravery and genius, good-heartedness, and warmth, and fidelity in friendship; telling the riotous, idle lads of Heidelberg and Halle, that—"The first-rate rower and first-rate wrangler of Cambridge and Oxford is no more fit to take his stand by the student revellers of Germany, than Caliban is by Hyperion!" This is surely straining beyond the mark. The Bursch must, we hope, guess as much, and smile at their extravagant panegyrist. The folly and the profligacy of members of the young aristocracy, or of the wealthy classes assembled at our Universities, are notorious; but their faults can be no palliation of the ruder if more venial errors of their German contemporaries; the quarrelling, fighting, beer-swilling, smoking, dare-devil, carousing boys of Jena, Göttingen, and so forth. The frequent duels of the German students is considered a bad feature in their manners; but they are, we apprehend, exposed to worse influences. These Bobadilian or rather Pistolian rencontres, are among the most harmless of their systematic follies. The ridicule which they would be sure to provoke in this country, would at once put an end to such bloodless affrays, where there is always great cry and little wool. The peace-loving Quaker will, we fear, preach in vain, when he exhorts the Oxonians and Cantabs to lay aside their pistols, and if they must occasionally have the enjoyment of the duello, to proceed like the German youths, who fight twenty duels with the sword for one that is fought in any manner at our universities, but yet never hurt each other. Pretty sport this for boys; though we fear Mr. Howitt, if he be not indeed slyly satirizing the German students, speaks in vain when he bids our fiery youth, if they will fight, abandon bullets, that fly through a man and let the soul after them, and be content (like the Bursch) with "a scratched nose or a punctured padding." The frequent practice of dueling—the great encourager, by the way, of a quarrelsome temper—can only be put down by ridicule, especially if, as we are told, to the honour of the German students, there are individuals of their number who have fought thirty or forty, and even sixty times, and yet have come out of the battle with only a few slight wounds on the face. Commend us in preference to this sham or braggadocio mode of fighting to the honest cudgel of the Handwerk-burschen—to the Knoten, so called from their weapon, the knotted stick; who if they, in their artisan vulgarity, dispense with a sword, which, in student hands, seems charmed into an innocent foil, do really exchange a few broken sconces and bloody noses in token of earnestness, and show at least something of animal courage.

In short, the duello of the German students, with its endless code of laws, seems to have about as much to do with real business, as had the Eglington Tournament with chivalry.

Dr. Cornelius shows himself learned in the duel and its laws; but the English public will, as we have hinted, be chiefly interested in learning that this barbarous practice, now degenerated into child's-play, is fast wearing out, and that, in the meanwhile, the brave lads seldom hurt themselves. Brave they are, whatever else their quarrelsome disposition and bloodless fights may augur. Their conduct towards the close of the late war, proved the high strain of their courage and their patriotic enthusiasm. Yet we must not have our own young men too far depreciated, being fully convinced that in similar circumstances the most exquisite of our students would have proved themselves very heroes. Of our crafts and prentices we are even more assured. The tailors, as they have formerly done, would have performed prodigies of valour. There was but one short period, during the war, in which this country was menaced with actual invasion. What then was the universal feeling of men, women, children, and students?—

Mr. Howitt, we have said, commences his task of translation with a very flattering preface, which might make the wild Bursch, glorying in his pipe, his beer-can, and his unkempt locks, fancy himself another Goethe, Körner, or Schiller; since he is told that it was from the heart of student-life that these illustrious persons, and a thousand others, "issued to glorify valour, or consecrate patriotism, or beautify the regions of the human soul by their songs and their imaginative prose." That modern Germany has produced many great writers, in spite of the corruptions and systematic irregularities of student-life, is the truer statement; and that many wild students grow up into good citizens and sober men, good husbands and fathers, is fortunately not peculiar to Germany. All the world over, Nature is more powerful than fashion or institution; or into what kind of depraved social condition would men's folly precipitate them.

We cannot perceive very much cause of apprehension in the student customs of Germany, though, on the other hand, we see little to admire in a system hastening to decay with the natural progress of society; however, if we may believe Mr. Howitt's testimony, (after, however, a suspiciously brief course of experience,) we must own that there is much to admire in the clan-feeling, or l'esprit de corps, generated by the usages of the Burschen. Heremarks of those who imagine that, at worst, the student-peculiarities end in insubordination, or a touch of profligacy, and at last in vapour—going off with hot youth—

They cannot know, as I do, that the loves and friendships formed by these youths are more permanent and indissoluble than in any class of men with whom I have yet become acquainted; nor that in private society, where, and in my own house, I have seen much of them, they are amongst the most accomplished, gentlemanly, temperate, correctly-mannered, cordial-hearted, and intellectual men that European society possesses. But all such persons I willingly turn over to the perusal of this volume, the work of a young but learned author, who has recently passed, by a splendid examination, out of this student-life itself without having ever fought a single duel, or very probably got half or even quarter seas over.

So, a man, who has wisely steered clear of the worst follies of the student, sets himself to glorify the sort of nonsense by which they court distinction in their own country, and expose themselves to the laughter of Europe!

The first chapter of Dr. Cornelius' work is of value, for it gives a view of the nature of the German Universities; and a good many young men still go both from this country and the United States, to study at some one of them. Student-life is the theme of the second chapter, which gives a view of their unions and clubs, particularly as they exist at Heidelberg, for Dr. Cornelius says nothing of any other university, from his personal knowledge. We are grieved to say that these Clubs have very different objects from those of the College Societies of Edinburgh, described in a pamphlet noticed in this Magazine. The best tendencies, and the most attractive features of student-life, are thus noticed by a writer on Heidelberg, quoted by Dr. Cornelius:—

The variety of nationalities which meet in Heidelberg give an intellectual activity to the associate-life of that student-world; and preserve it, at least, from the eternal monotony of fixed conventional forms, stale jests, fade word-wit, and bookworm pedantry. The happy-spirited, practical, intelligent Palatine; the simple, honest Swabian, who has seen only the world which lies between his own mountains, but with his sound, clear intellect, penetrates through everything; the open Rhineland; the pithy Hessian; the polite, socially-accomplished, well-bred, reserved North-German; and the grave, self-confident Hanseatic—each brings a different style of accomplishments, a different view of life, different experience;—each race maintains its own natural character, without withdrawing itself, however, from the impressions of the other nationalities, and the equipoising influence of the common elements of their confluent existence. Add to these, the numerous foreigners—Swiss, French, Belgian, English, Spanish, who soon find themselves disposed to attach themselves in preference to one of the German races, and ready, through the common medium of social life, to receive somewhat from all, and give to all somewhat, as it may happen.

It is indispensable to good ten amongst the students of Heidelberg, more or less to have travelled. The vicinity of the Rhine, of France, of Switzerland, excites to still further excursions, for which the vacation affords a favourable opportunity; and those thus returning from distant regions, from Paris, from the Alps, or from the sea, bring with them new and very varied impressions,—whose communication, exchange, and turning to account, again for a long time fill up and refresh the intellectual life, not only of the individual, but of the meetings of the national Chores, the associations formed from the general body of the students.

Of the Chores, or unions of the students, the same anonymous writer remarks:—

The division into such unions, according to nations and landsmanships, was the dictate of nature herself. Their existence was acknowledged by the state, and honoured by it as a very ancient arrangement. Out of these combinations sprung, about the end of the sixteenth, and beginning of the seventeenth century, the so-called ORDERS. When at length their aim began to appear not wholly pure, they met with government opposition; and in their place again stood forth the landsmanschafts, similar to the early national divisions, but so far different, that to the landsmanschafts belonged not only the students who were actually natives of the country whose name the union bore, but all who chose to enter the same, and submit themselves to its regulations, were received by it. All these landsmanschafts from 1815, amalgamated themselves into one common Burschenschaft; till the bloody act of Sand, in 1819, drew the attention of government upon that union, and became the occasion that the greater number of persons withdrew from the Burschenschaft, and again resolved themselves into particular landsmanschafts; or, declining to belong to extensive unions, lived politically isolated. Those societies which had in the course of time assumed so many different forms, now began to frame their own laws, and to choose their own leaders. The members of each association had their peculiar badge of distinction, others wore their colours; and in the very nature of things, the constitution of such unions became more elaborate; their regulations increased in number; and ceremonies, in order to give to the whole exterior pomp and circumstance, could not be long wanting.

The Chores will be easily understood when we say they closely resemble the Nations into which the students of the Glasgow and Aberdeen Universities divide themselves. Each Chore has its officers, its colours, its badge, and its sign or token, and, we may add, its own beer-shop, and hall for fighting harmless duels; harmless, at least, as to physical consequences. The Knelp, or beer-shop in particular, is a most vital part of the Chores. But if, in relation to the common pursuits of the associates, the German Chores resemble the Scottish Nations, they are in substance genuine convivial clubs; of which sometimes an old one dies out for lack of members, and another starts up. The aggregate meetings of the Chores of a university is termed the Allgemeine.

All the members of a Chore seem bound to assemble to drink beer and smoke every night. This is the fundamental part of its constitution; and a meeting of the aggregate Chores, or the general meeting to drink beer, affords the members, as we can well believe—

A fine opportunity to pick quarrels with one another,—in student phrase, to touchsires each other; that is, to give offence, so that the swords may not rust. The newly-established Chore now takes the customary course. It strikes up a friendly alliance with one of the already existing Chores, in which its members find the greatest number of their acquaintances, at the same time that it assumes a hostile attitude to another. It falls into dispute with the hostile Chore, and what is called the Chore-katze, a regular Chore-baiting, breaks out; that is, there ensues a general challenging between the members of the two Chores. The duels thus originated are fought in succession, and the Chore is said to pack itself out; that is, to drum or fight itself forward. Hereby it testifies its mastership with its weapons, and intense is the interest which hangs on the result of the Paukerieren, or fights, between the leaders of each Chore. The conquerors have their victory celebrated by their companions the same evening in the Knelp, where they triumph over their antagonists. When a Chore has thus proved itself, it holds its Antritt-Commerz—entrance, or opening commerce, or festivity, of which more hereafter; and to which the new Chore invites the leaders of the other Chores. The qualifications by which a member of a Chore can raise himself in it, are practice in the exercise of arms, bodily and intellectual dexterity in general; a good stomach, that he may be able to carry plenty of beer; and, besides these, a powerful voice is a grand requisite. As observed, the members of the Chore elect their leaders. The first of these is the Senior. He must possess the qualifications we have mentioned in a pre-eminent degree, and must have already passed through the other offices of the Chore, as here following.

We must not tire our readers with more Chore customs. It is to be kept in remembrance, that though this is called the student-life of Germany, happily not one half of the students join these associations ; and the revels of some of those who do join in these bacchanalian celebrations have probably no more foundation in fact than had the revels of the Noctes Ambrosianæ. It is not, therefore, so much the excesses actually perpetrated, as the bad tone of the whole affair, and the incitement to the commission of such follies, which spread beyond the university, that is to be condemned. And these are not matters of jest.

Into the laws and bye-laws of the Chores we shall not enter. They are minute and complicated, and abundantly absurd in the Lilliputian importance assumed by the legislators. Though we can perceive no necessary connexion between the modern rise or emancipation of German national literature, and the Burschenschaft, admitting that the college associations may have been promotive of the national literature,—we quote the following passage as a specimen of Dr. Cornelius's style of thought, and Mr. Howitt's manner of translation ; which we take for granted must be accurate, as Dr. Cornelius, who was at the translator's elbow, possesses a knowledge of the English language :—

The origin of the first actual Burschenschaft is to be sought in the times when, on the establishment of the Rhenish Prince-league, which placed itself submissively under the sceptre of Napoleon, and the consequent abdication of the imperial throne of Germany by Francis II. in 1806, every heart that beat with a German feeling must have been seized with the deepest sorrow at the fall and dashing to pieces of the Father-land. An earnest desire to be able to give help to the outraged country—the belief in a God who alone was able to free it from its oppressions—filled the heart of the patriot, and must have roused him to a tone of mind, than which nothing could be farther from that serene enjoyment of life, often bordering on actual frivolity, to which the members of academical unions were not rarely accustomed to resign themselves. A patriotic spirit, a zealous, earnest aspiration, had already proclaimed itself in the latter years of the former century. Already in its seventieth year had the Poet-league at Göttingen organized itself under Klopstock. John Heinrich Voss, the two Grafts Stollberg, Hölty, and others, belonged to it. At the same time tumbled that fabric which the Order of Jesus had artfully raised, and the German language was finally established in those rights, out of which it had so long been expelled. The lachrymose tribe of common tragedies, and the moving comedies with which Kotzebue and Iffland overflowed the stage, were compelled to give place to knightly dramas, and Goethe's Götz von Berlichingen became for the hundredth time imitated. The German Muse attained a higher flight through Lessing, and finally displayed herself to the world in the two noble forms of Schiller and Goethe. The first, far from all lightness, full of deep earnestness and noble sentiment, sought chiefly to effect the moral elevation and intellectual accomplishment of youth ; and the youthful freshness of his language gave to his often more philosophical than poetical reflections and sentences, an irresistible charm for young minds. Goethe moved in a contrary direction. With a predominant sentiment for beauty, and an eminent talent for imitation, he sported through every department of literature, and floated perpetually with the current of the intellectual tendency of the age. By such men the German language was speedily advanced to its point of perfection ; the French language ceased to be the conversation language of the court and of the polite circles. Joseph II. introduced the German language into the court of Vienna ; after the death of Frederick II. it became acknowledged as that of the court of Prussia. For a long time Weimar became pre-eminently the capital city of German accomplishment ; and Goethe, Schiller, Wieland, Herder, and other distinguished men, found in the court of Weimar, a sphere of action as honourable for themselves as advantageous to the literature of their country. The French ascendancy in literature had thus ceased at the very point of time when the French political ascendancy came to lie heavy and oppressively on the nation ; the literary honour sharpened that bitter feeling of political shame, and the more the German people learned to feel it, the stronger became its impatience to liberate itself from that condition into which it had been reduced by the French. But on whom must this feeling have seized more powerfully than on the student ! To whom must the situation of Germany have occasioned more serious apprehensions than to him ! On the one hand, sufficiently instructed to perceive the dangers which threatened the political and literary liberty of Germany ; on the other, full of youthful spirit, and of desires to help the oppressed Fatherland,—such sentiments must have weaned the students from the trivial pursuit of Landmannships and Orders, and accordingly those of the same sentiment united themselves into a Burschenschaft. The object of this first union was noble ; namely, to rescue the Fatherland ; and in order to be able to do this worthily, to raise up men strengthened to the utmost completeness of both moral and physical constitution. Thence came it, that bodily exercises, especially gymnastics, rose into new existence ; that the Burschen sought to invigorate themselves by hardships of every kind ; thence, that they strove after the greatest possible purity of manners, and displayed a spirit of hostility towards the less pure tendencies of the yet existing orders. Germany's noblest sons belonged then to the Burschenschaft. These unions had their leaders and laws, much in the same manner as the Chores. . . . In these companies ruled no aristocratic power, as was the case in those of the Chores, especially towards the younger members. To establish a thorough union amongst the students, was a main object of the Burschenschaft. On this account the duel was not permitted between the members of the union ; and duels between the members of the orders were very much circumscribed, and only in cases of real injuries, or gross offences, and then under certain conditions, permitted by the court of honour. The Burschenschafts of different university cities stood in combination with each other, and members from one city were in the habit of making visits to the members of the other university cities. The Burschenschafts, as then constituted, were in most places allowed, or at least tolerated. They celebrated often, and with the consent of the prorector, their so-called foundation-day, or anniversary, with great banqueting, public processions, music and torch-trains. The members of these companies conducted themselves so discreetly, that people willingly suffered them, and any little distinctions which might gratify youthful vanity—the wearing of the old German costume, the short coat, the broad out-lying shirt-collar, with the open breast, the cap which but scantily covered the long down-hanging hair, and which, as well as the coat, was mostly of black velvet—such old Germanisms and peculiar attire were cheerfully conceded to them. Hitherto must the life and movements of the Burschenschaft be styled noble. With enthusiasm its members received the call to the fight of freedom, which resounded from Prussia in the year 1813 ; and from all the universities streamed forth volunteers, to join themselves to the German host, which was to do battle with the oppressors of the Fatherland. Theodore Körner has immortalized in his songs the feelings and sentiments of the German youth at that glorious crisis. Many Burschen died, like him, the hero's death, inspired with equal zeal for the good cause ; though it was alone permitted to the poet to flash radiantly forth, as from a mirror, the inner glow of his spirit in patriotic song.

Appropos to this eloquent digression of the German Doctor,—either he or Mr. Howitt, by way of interlude, introduces the Sword Song of Körner, with the music, in the exact manner in which so many of the best of the National and Burschen Melodies have appeared in this Magazine. After the admirable translations of this noble song, by Mrs.

Hemans, Professor Blackie, Mr. J. R. Chorley, and others, we shall not venture upon this new one, which was a rather bold attempt. A few more sentences is devoted by Dr. Cornelius to the history of the battle of Leipsic, and an account of the object of the solemn league and covenant of the Holy Allies,—which would deserve both commentary and reprobation if it appeared in any accredited historical work;—and then Mr. Howitt introduces Arndt's well-known song of the German's Fatherland,* which has been translated at least as often as the Sword Song,—so that it too, may be passed. The history of the Burschenschaft is traced through its after follies; when the young men having no longer a common object with the rest of their countrymen, and puffed up with conceit as the imagined deliverers of their country, had no idea of gracefully retiring into College life, though their work was done. An infusion of liberal ideas redeemed these follies; but Dr. Cornelius makes small account of this elevating tendency:—

The secret unions which were formed during the ascendancy of Napoleon still continued. The excitement of the public mind, which at an earlier period had been favoured even by the Government itself, so far from having subsided, had rather received a new impulse, and as it had now necessarily lost its outward tendency, it sought to take effect in the heart of Germany. The government saw with suspicion the drift of the secret unions, and their influence on the Gymnastic schools and universities; they heard with astonishment the bold language of the rising generation approximating itself to political fanaticism. The German Confederation satisfied not these heads on fire with ideas of one and a free Germany. The restoration of the empire, in connexion with one of the prevailing theories of conformable national representation, was the master desire of a numerous party, which was spread wide through Germany, and rendered the universities the seminaries of their doctrines. The youth entered with pride into the idea, that they were called to work out their salvation, from the circumstances to which their fathers had reduced them. Political notions of the Middle Ages mingled themselves in the heads of the student youth, with the revolutionary doctrines of modern times, and received, moreover, from religious enthusiasm, a dark addition. Thus degenerated the Burschenschaft, in a manner most deeply to be deplored, and demonstrated in a melancholy degree how near to each other lie the boundaries of truth and falsehood. Noble patriotism metamorphosed itself into a gloomy fanaticism,—zeal for religion and morals, into a hollow hypocrisy, and into a still more dangerous pseudo-philosophy. The landsmanschafts became continually weaker in the German universities, and the young men every day added themselves to the burschenschaft in greater numbers. Truly the greater number of them never dreamed to what lengths such a political fanaticism could lead them; and only by degrees and unobserved mounted the arrogance of an inconsiderate youth, till at length it persuaded itself that it alone had fought out the liberation war, and therefore was now called to give to Fatherland a new constitution.

These perilous imaginations grew continually faster and faster into that horrible avalanche which threatened to overwhelm everything. What a difference between the years 1816 and 1817, when one compares the celebration of the peace anniversary of 1816, with that of the celebration of the October days of 1817!

Here there might have been room for a note from Mr. Howitt, as a good radical; but he does not interfere with the text.

A thumping piece of the book-making which swells the volume is found in the account given by Dr. Cornelius, from the newspapers of the period, of the celebrations referred to; and then we have the Union Song of Arndt, of which, as it is less known than the Sword Song and the German Fatherland, we shall take the last stanza as a specimen of the translated verse:—

Close in,—the sacred circle throng now,
And raise the clash of triumph strong;
From heart to heart, from tongue to tongue now,
Like lightning send this joyful song:—
The Word that knits our bond for ever;—
The Good no fiend can from us rend,—
Nor tyrant villany can sever,—
Believe!—maintain it to the end!

The Prussian Government soon took alarm at the spirit of freedom which burst forth at these celebrations, and which, though the students and professors were the prominent actors, had also to some extent seized the people. After the celebration of the anniversary of the Battle of Leipsic in October 1817—

The Prussian government ordered the trial of all those who had taken part in the festival; and several professors who had been present, particularly Fries, came under judicial examination. From these trials it was made obvious that the few only were in the secret of the proposed auto-da-fé to be held in Eisenach, but that the majority regarded it as a desirable opportunity for drawing the Burschenschaft into a more intimate and close union, so that it might the more powerfully operate against the landsmanschafts.

The festival was like the prior one of October, celebrated with much enthusiasm, with sacred service, with singing of Fatherland hymns, and other solemnities; but speeches were delivered, on this occasion, which had not a thoroughly correct tendency, and must appear the more unfitting from the mouth of a teacher of youth. On the evening of the 18th of October, as formerly on that night, fires blazed up on every hill top; but those of the Burschenschaft who had stationed themselves around the fire on the Wartburg, cast into the flames the German History of Kotzebue, as well as some other detested writings. None of the professors, however, were present at this transaction, and none of the speeches connected therewith were delivered by them. That the acts of the Congress of Vienna had been also burnt there, was proved by the inquiry to be false.

The Wartburg festival was concluded on the 19th of October by the assembled participants, to the number of about 600, taking the sacrament in the church. The consequence of this festival was the promotion of the idea here conceived, of one universal German Burschenschaft; that the union of the whole body of student youth must pervade, and be the means of working out, the union of the whole Fatherland.

The contest between the students and the government was now fairly begun, and on this occasion is introduced the song, Wo Muth und Kraft. We are less disposed to forgive a huge cantle of paper and print, devoted to the fanatic, or rather the monomaniac, Sand, than other things of the same sort. It is enough that the foul crime of this half madman, afforded a handle to the government to put down the rising spirit of liberty; and to extinguish all of political good that was knit up with the Burschenschaft. Though this love of liberty was too often as much a hatred of France, a narrow nationality, it was a germ worthy of being cherished, until it had expanded into healthier and more vigorous growth. And what is the condition of the German youth now? They have, we are told, awoke—

Out of the dreams of Burschenschaft freedom; and the sounding rush of steam-engines will probably not permit them easily to fall again into this giddy trance. The bond of an universal Burschenschaft no longer embraces the whole body of German students, but the professors of every political as well as religious creed move amongst each other in manifold circles. Like ignes fatui flicker here and there yet; Burschenschaft ideas, but their flame has seldom strength to burn, and soon expires again for want of fuel, which, in fact, is diligently withdrawn. Still has its flame, ever and anon, in recent times, hoisted on the mountain tops, streamed up a lightning fire-pillar of Freedom; but the rulers of Germany have speedily smothered it, anxiously watching lest the political fabric raised with so much toil, should become, with all its stockwork and timbers, a prey to the devouring element. They have also taken care that the youth shall not, forgetting his original duty, fall into this labyrinth. During his period of study, only too often is he reminded by the ever-present sense of the government examination, that he is a citizen of a German state. Is it to be feared, that we have fallen into the opposite extreme; that the zeal for the political and literary freedom of Germans is extinguished; and that a stupid and creeping slavery has taken its place? No, thank God, we are not yet come so far as that. A striking testimony of this, is the sentiment which just recently has made itself felt as the common spirit of Germany against France, glowing with the enthusiasm of former years, and to which that new Rhine song of Bekker—"They shall not have it!"—owes its origin.

Thus Dr. Cornelius identifies the zeal for political and literary freedom, with the common hatred of French aggression; an admirable feeling in itself, but not quite enough, as Mr. Howitt ought to tell him.

The first half-year which a young man spends at the Heidelberg University, would seem to be a very idle, if not riotous, period. But this is not peculiar to the German Universities, and merits no particular apology or explanation. Nor need we from a German work borrow the ordinary common-place arguments, whether sound or fallacious, for public schools.

The view given of the college life of Germany, in a series of papers in this Magazine,* by "a Bursch of genuine cut," and a man of learning and genius, who had become almost as thoroughly German as British, supersedes many things that we find in Mr. Howitt's translation of Dr. Cornelius. Nay, we venture to think, that Dr. Cornelius himself has been not a little indebted to our contributor, who has traced so vivid a picture of student-life as to leave little more to be wished for. But then it is student-life as it is to be found now; while the history given by Dr. Cornelius also goes back into usages as old as the Middle Ages, and most of them long since exploded, though he has found their memorial existing in Hauff and other antiquarian writers. From many of these tedious and obsolete matters, the reader is agreeably relieved when Mr. Howitt favours him with a song, or the engraver with the representation of a carouse or a tilting-match.

The drinking usages have some interest, as vestiges of rude antiquity; though they are not half so curious as those found in Mr. Dunlop's volume, in which the drinking usages of all the Crafts,—those common to Britain and Germany,—are detailed. For the Commers we refer to this Magazine.

Dr. Cornelius occasionally introduces an illustrative anecdote, or a little story of a student. One of those which he tells, of a poor weak-minded creature, whom the cruel or inconsiderate practical jokes of his fellow-students drove into harmless idiocy, is not creditable to the state of moral feeling among the young men. Their grade in the scale of morals will be better understood when we have seen something more of their private life, which is described in a series of conversations, in which an English Traveller is introduced to a student's apartments at Heidelberg.

The student knows how to live here. He has fitted up his room very commodiously. The sleeping-room certainly is somewhat small; often, rather an alcove, in which, besides his bed, his wardrobe, his dressing-table, and a large trunk, there is little to be seen. But one might almost pronounce his sitting-room comfortable, were it not distinguished by rather too much of a lyrical disorder. Books, pipes, rapiers, clothes, coffee, and writing apparatus, are somewhat too little assorted; and the stove, standing in the room itself—but Germans in this respect know no better. Yet one must admit that those little machines, which look like an adaphory, between a Roman urn and a German beer-jug, and which one might take by the end of the long pipe and carry with one along the streets, are very well adapted to the needs of the student, who commonly only wiles away an hour at home, and then hastens again to the college, since they quickly warm the room, and as quickly let it cool again. They are readily made hot, so that you may easily when at full heat light your pipe at them.

There are not wanting tables, chairs, a commode, a writing-table and book-shelves, and a sofa that is pretty well used. Our host, at first sight, looked, to my fancy, somewhat Turkish, as at our morning visit he sat enjoying his pipe and coffee, in a coloured plaid morning-gown and showy slippers. But the legs—no, they were not crossed in Turkish fashion, but stretched out at will from the sofa in true English style, and seemed to feel themselves very much at home in the room. He had a handkerchief thrown loosely round his neck, and the small round, and embroidered cap sat not inelegantly on his head. These caps, as I learned in course of conversation, are termed cervis, or beer-caps. What especially struck me in the apartment, were the various decorations which adorned the walls in gay rows, and the signification of which our host politely explained to me. Upon one wall was displayed a long line of profiles, all under glass, and in small gilt frames. A coloured Chord-band falling from above, wound about them, and comprehended them, as it were, in one great family. "These," said he, "are in memory of the friends who have contributed to embellish my six semesters at the university;" and I learned that it was the practice, especially of those who belonged to the same Chord, mutually to honour each other with those little likenesses.

"We have here," said he, "in Heidelberg, the Herr Münch, who executes these things in first-rate style, and derives almost a livelihood alone from this branch of business. It is the same in other places. I have already passed some time in Jena, Berlin, and Bonn, and have enjoyed the friendship of many a brave Bursch. There, you see the views of many a city through which I have travelled. They will to the latest hour yield me delightful recollections." These, with the well executed portraits of many professors, filled a second wall. Amongst them proudly displayed themselves several printed diplomas of the doctoral diplomas of his friends.

"And whose likeness is this which hangs in the midst?" I asked. "That," he replied, "is the portrait of our famous Pawkdoctor, which cannot be wanting in any kneip."

On the third wall I beheld pipes of all forms and sizes, from the meerscham to the clay pipe; and my polite host promised me at the next opportunity, to give me a lecture, as he expressed it, on these articles of furniture. My eye was now caught by the garniture which I beheld about the looking-glass. It was hung round with ribbons of various colours, and above it appeared the remains of garlands. As I noticed them my host said—"See, those are flowers out of the mourning garlands which deck many a departed friend who sleeps in the cool earth; which we carefully preserve."

"And the ribbons with the many inscriptions and the dates!" I asked. "Those," said he, "are my Chore-brothers; and the date indicates the foundation-day of our Verbindung."

On the fourth wall were to be seen a Schlager with the Chore-colours; a chore-cap and a guitar, with several coloured rosettes. There stood also a little table, and upon it apparatus for drinking and smoking; a large Deckel-glass with a lid, having upon it an engraved inscription, "Traumansdorf to his Freisleben, 18th July, 1838;" an elegant little casket with tobacco, a spill-vase, a study-lamp, a vessel denominated the Pope, to receive the ashes of the tobacco on emptying the pipe, and an incombustible spill, or Fidebus, a new discovery, and certainly one of the most useful of the nineteenth century. This consists of a small strong coloured glass tube, which is partly filled with spirits of wine, and closed with a cork; through which a wire is thrust, and to the bottom end of which wire is secured a small knob of wood wrapped in cotton wool. This wire has a ring at the top, by which it is pulled out, and the knob ignited at the lamp when it is wished to light a pipe—a convenient piece of machinery, and also forming an ornament to the table.

This is certainly the only article that an Oxonian would covet in the German student's chambers. Fox is a favourite term among the students. Among the other species of Fox is the Boot-fox, who is equivalent to the servant, or the laundress of the English student, who has no occasional male-servant; or to the temporary valet of the young men of Paris. His functions are thus described to the English stranger :—

"I am very curious," said I, "to know who the man was that walked in without knocking, and whom you styled Boot-fox. He looked like a servant that, instead of livery, a man has stuck into a student's coat; and what a cap he had on! And besides that, he had such a curious voice that one could have thought it belonged to some other person, or that somebody else was in the room when he spoke."

"Ha! ha! I will explain that to you. This odd fellow belongs to a class of ministering spirits who live entirely by the students. We dub them Boot-foxes, because they clean our boots and clothes. They are bound to run also on our commissions, and must figure in processions and public pageants. As the poor devil must turn out very early in the mornings, his voice snaps and cracks huskily from the effects of the raw air, like that of a youth in the transition-state from a hobbledohoy to a man, till by degrees it balances itself in one key. For the rest he is a respectable father of a family, and his wife is generally a washerwoman for the students."

"All that is easy enough to understand," I replied. "Why do you call him a boot-fox?"

"And may I ask," I added, "what you pay this precious Bursch for his important services? I ask, since I think of staying here this winter, and would therefore willingly enlighten myself on all matters of housekeeping."

"He receives a guilder (twenty-pence English) monthly." "A servant for a pound a-year! Was the like ever heard!"

"You must recollect," said Freisleben, "that we are for the rest of the day attended by the house-besom," the student phrase for housemaid, who also in Berlin is styled schlarin, or she-slave.

German students, like, indeed, all other corporations, associations, or castes of men, as the gipsies, colliers, sailors, have a slang of their own; and a fondness for nicknames. Besides Foxes of all kinds, they have, as our readers must know, Philistines,—and, indeed, all who are not students are distinguished by this term. Here is the House-Philistine, as described to the stranger :—

Our House-Philistine must provide for all our domestic necessities, bringing in the account monthly, which, however, we are not obliged so very exactly to pay. They furnish us with wood, lights, &c. Breakfast we commonly brew for ourselves, in its proper machine. For the lodging, consisting of two rooms, we pay perhaps from thirty to forty guilder, and the house-besom [the maid-servant] receives besides, each semester, two kronen thaler—nine shillings, English."

"Upon my word, you live right reasonably in Heidelberg."

"Not quite so much so as you imagine. If you take into account the expense of the college lectures, you cannot well, at least pleasantly, live under 800 or 1000 guilder. There are universities where you may live much cheaper, but few where you can live so agreeably as here. You know how Lichtenberg has divided the sciences. So I might here divide the universities into such as where a man may live cheaply and well, to which class Munich and Vienna particularly belong; where he may live cheap and badly, as in many of the smaller universities, particularly Halle, which affords only nutriment for the hungerers after knowledge; where he may live well and somewhat expensively, as at Heidelberg; and finally, where he may live dearly and ill, of which the great Berlin is an example. I speak here only of the material life, apart from which, every university has its peculiarities in many respects; in short, has its own ton. When you have learnt thoroughly to understand Heidelberg, and then afterwards visit other German universities, what a variety will you not find?"

The students sometimes combine to punish tradesmen, eating-house keepers, and beer-dealers, as in other places. At this interview, the Widow Mutch, recently put under bann, was announced for the purpose of imploring forgiveness. It was told :—

"She creeps humbly to the cross, and prays earnestly that we will again take our meals there."

"Well, if she behaves herself, we will see what the S. C. can do."

"That," said I, "if I remember right, is the woman whom you said had been put into cerruf, or under the bann."

"The same."

"And are all the students, then, accustomed to take their dinners there?"

"O, no. Part of them at the Gasthouses (inns); part here and there, with private people, who keep a table for us, and even send us, if required, our meals up into our chambers. About thirty of us took our dinners at this aforesaid widow's, and paid each twenty kreutzers the day (not quite seven-pence.) But towards the conclusion of the last semester, it was no longer to be endured! simply and eternally cow-beef—and at last it grew still worse. Thereupon it was absolutely necessary to give Madame, the Philistine, a lecture."

"Excuse me," I interrupted, "but I must first beg for a solution of the term Philistine, which you so often use."

"We comprehend all who are not students under the name of Philistines. In a more restricted sense, we understand by Philistines, inhabitants of the city, and distinguish them from the Handwerks-Burschen, by giving to the latter the title of Knoten; and the shopkeepers' youngmen that of Schwünge, or Ladenschwünge, that is, Pendulums, or Shop-pendulums."

The student's landlord, we have said, is styled the House-Philistine,—the landlady the Philise; a fellow-lodger is a House-Bursch; a chum, a Stuben-Bursch.

"But," I interposed, "it seems to me that you enjoy your comfortable room very little, spite of all its comforts, if you neither dine nor take your tea there of an evening."

"Tea!" he exclaimed, "tea! yes that is a right good beverage, but for daily use a little too sentimental. Look you—our course of life is this:—In the morning we pursue our studies over a cup of coffee, and a pipe of tobacco; then we go to the classes. About twelve o'clock we dine; then to the coffee-house; and how much we study after that, or how we otherwise employ ourselves, you will presently see. But in the evening we resort to the Kneip, and drink no tea, but beer; and to the Kneip we now cordially invite you."

The morality of the Burschen on some points is sufficiently lax, if the following be faithful portraiture, which we hope may be doubted:—

In the persiflage on the Burschen-comment, entitled "Disertatio de Quomodo, etc.," by Martial Schluck, from which we have before quoted, it is said, "an honourable Bursch has the right not to pay his debts; that is, he may schwänzen and quiscon himself, make a quis in his shoes,—meaning that he may sacrifice his tail like a fox, who will rather lose his tail than his life; and thus will the student rather leave behind him his trunk and cloak-bag, than wait to be clapped into prison."

When a student attends a lecture which ought to be paid for, but does not pay for it, he is said to "hospitiren;" and he is allowed twice or three times to hospitiren. If, however, he does this for a whole semester, in order to devote the price of the lecture to some other object, the students call this to "shoot a lecture." The description of this term, is also thus explained by Schluck. "The student has the right to seize upon other people's property, that is, to shoot, to prefer, to lay the charge upon another. This is a new mode of putting oneself in possession of something; that is, to commit a theft of a life-and-soulless thing, and call it only a half-theft. Shooting distinguishes itself essentially from stealing. First, by the student privately conveying it away at once; and, secondly, by giving the owner of the property notice of what he had done, after it is done. This mode of taking possession is not so much according to our customs as those of the Lacedæmonians, which brought no shame to any one by the statutes of Lycurgus, but rather honour and fame, to him who unobserved and in a clever style carried off anything."

The principal objects of conveyance, are pipes, sticks, spurs, chore-tassels for the embellishment of pipes, riding-whips, and money to the amount of a doubel. What is more than that must be merely taken in loan, if it be there to take.

Every genuine Bursch, the member of a chore, has generally a favourite dog; his constant friend and companion: the dog is often, it is said,—

The best of chamber attendants, bringing in the morning his master's slippers and pipe. If he returns home at night rather inspired by Bacchus, he accompanies him as a safe conductor, often bearing things which he has unwittingly dropt, after him.

A dog at one of the universities was well known as an excellent guide. He led his master home every evening; if he turned into a wrong street, he seized him by the coat, and pulled him back; if he fell down, he barked loudly till he rose again; and when they arrived at the house, the sagacious animal knew very well how to ring the bell.

They are also made use of in many a prank or piece of waggery. Thus it is said, that once in Leipsic, the students accustomed their dogs to the most frequent christian names of the ladies of that city, and so soon as they came readily at that unusual call, the ungallant sons of the Muses allowed themselves the unpardonable joke of shouting aloud those names in the public walks, so that it is said, the fair sex in surprise quitted the field.

We still see these creatures made co-workers in many a frolic. At the dinner table, in the public walk, in the fencing-school, and in the evening at the Kneip, everywhere must the dog attend his master. He must eat with him in the same house; the master, indeed, in the chamber, the dog in the kitchen; for which repast, however, is allowed on the dog's behalf two kreutzers a-day. Neither are combats wanting between them, whereby they may the more resemble their masters, and to which the masters, in fact, conduct them. In these dog-duels it goes often much worse than in those of their lords, for they seize each other so furiously that it is often difficult to separate them.

No make-believe in the dog-fights; which is so much the better, where there is fighting at all, as the best way to put an end to it. Even dogs who have enjoyed a fair set-to learn forbearance. Yet the connexion between the dog and his student-master is but temporary, which diminishes the charm. The dog is generally left a legacy to a friend, and sometimes has no master but the whole chore; nor home, save the kneips. The Pipe obtains full and honourable mention. The rural and summer amusements of the students of Heidelberg,—their holiday processions, and excursions far and near, are described; and also their winter festivities. In the works of recent travellers, we have frequent passing glimpses of them, in the Hartz Mountains, amid the Black Forest, or in Switzerland; dirty, jovial, roistering fellows, drinking beer and singing night and day; and sometimes begging. They do not ride to cover quite so systematically as the Oxford men, yet the solitary student sometimes roves abroad with his gun; and they all rarely enjoy the neighbouring wakes and fairs. Church-wakes seem still as common in Germany, as they were in England three hundred years since; but the *Kirchweih*s of Germany merit attention, independently of the students, as a trait of ancient manners:—

The reader must not alarm himself with the fear that we are going to bore him with an essay on church solemnities—we allude only to those popular festivities with which the anniversary of the dedication of a church is celebrated. As is often the case, this feast has lost its original intention; scarcely any one thinks of the meaning of the word, which in the mouth of the ordinary people is corrupted to Kerree. Every little nest, much too poor for the possession of a church, yes, many an individual public-house, even, has its particular Kirchweih. By what authority it has usurped this name and holiday, nobody troubles himself to inquire. People are quite contented that, through these Kirchweihen, of which one or more fall out within their reach every Sunday during the summer, they find occasion to dance, drink, and sing. From every city gate then presses forth a motley group; the worthy burger, the Handwerksbursch, the alert young dressmaker, the homely housemaid, all are crowding forward in a promiscuous throng. Amongst them one deserves companies of a higher grade, which rejoice themselves in the splendid summer's day. In the midst of this tumult the students are also to be seen following the current of the great stream in smaller or greater companies. If in modern times the singular attire less distinguishes him from the crowd, yet the practised eye readily singles out the student from the Handwerksbursch and the shop-assistant. On the countenance of the Handwerker we see displayed the joy which he feels to find himself once more for a day able to flee from the dusty workshop, and the pride of showing himself in his Sunday bravery, in the astonished eyes, as he believes, of the world. This holiday array he has truly often thrown upon his back in a queer enough style. In black frock-coat, white trousers, high cravat, and glittering boots, stalks he clumsily along, and his rude taste extends itself to the very pipe which he carries in his hand. On the contrary, the Pendulum [the shopman] has clad himself after the newest French fashion. All is smoothed and polished off to a nicety. He looks like a dish that the hungry Nero has licked into the most elegant cleanness. Scarcely dare he turn himself in his beautiful clothes lest he should crumple the ornate and artistical knot of his neckcloth; lest he should derange the nice tournure of his locks. He wheels himself aside only to see whether the admiring gaze of the fair sex is not following him. "Nöckig," would the student say—that is, "it would be well for him if he did!"

The student disdains, Knoten-like, to beautify himself on a Sunday. One day is like another to him; he can devote it either to study or to pleasure. So, as on other days, he lounges carelessly along. His attire is not studied, but it is convenient; and according to individual taste, more or less excellently chosen. A short frock-coat, often of a peculiar cut, and the little cap, are all that distinguish him.

Here we have the German Bartlemy or Donnybrook Fair,—both, alas! now no more:—

The Kirchweih which in the neighbourhood of Heidelberg are the most noted, are those of Neckarsteinach and Kirscheim. Thither, some years ago, some of the most conspicuous burger families were accustomed to make an annual rustic pilgrimage of pleasure. This glory is gone by; yet we would recommend the latter still as the best place in which for the stranger to witness this folks'-feast, if so we may term it. We follow the sound of obstreperous music, and enter a garden, where a motley multitude presents itself to our sight. All the tables are filled; people eat and drink, chatter and smoke, laugh and sing, all in one chaos of merry confusion. Hither and thither, where an impatient guest, thumps vigorously on the table with his glass, run the waiters—in the student's tongue, Faxe. At one table an honest burger company has planted itself, and over a glass of wine, weigh seriously whether the European balance of power can be maintained, and criticise the government of the city.

No, no, I like him not; our span-new burgermaster,
As he's so bold already, he'll come it thick and faster.
And for the town, what doth he, pray?
Gets it not worse then every day?

Certain youngsters have seated themselves beside them in a state of considerable perplexity, whether they shall be held fast by the wise conversation of these elders, or shall follow the bewitching sounds of youthful merriment.

At the next table, a knot of Bauers, carry on a zealous discourse, of which one catches these syllables in passing,—“Oney think o' that, now; that the thing can run so wi'out hosses. It's got the divil in't's body, an' that the outlandish folk have fun' out again!” It is the railroads that have thrown the fat farmers into such a heat, and they raise themselves into such a fidget with talking of the steam-engines, that they blow as much smoke out of their earthen pipes, called by the students carthly pipes, as the engines themselves can send out steam.

But at another table we behold the dear image of youth. The Handwerksbursch, who treats his maiden with wine and cakes; the school youth who is there playing off the bursch before them, but looks round, ever and anon, lest the original that he is counterfeiting be near, or his teacher, who walking this way might reprove his presumption; the fresh country maiden, and the gay damsel of the city, all desire to make themselves amiable, and seek by their tittering and laughter, to let every one observe that they are capably entertained by their swains.

One table is occupied by the students, who, revelling in a rich repast, now look up at the beauty of the Nockar-Thal, and now mix themselves in the throng, whispering with this and that maiden, to whom their shepherds cast frowns like thunder-clouds. But careless of this, the sons of the Muses conduct them forward to the dancing-floor:

And all already dance like mad—
Juchhe! Juchhe!
Juchheiss! Heiss! Ha!
So goes the fiddle-bow.

Faster and faster goes the music, and ever madder whirls the waltz. In complete equality and freedom seem here the most opposite elements to be mingled. The atmosphere is already smothering hot, and clouds of dust fly up. But that matters not. He that finds it too hot flings off his coat, and dances in his shirt sleeves; he that does not find the music keep time, helps it with the stamping of his foot. All seems totally happy—all unity. But the wine has, meantime, heated their heads, and suddenly in one corner of the hall rises a terrible hubbub. The strife has arisen about that maiden who, there weeping, endeavours to part the combatants. “What would the silly Knoten!” cries a student. Then springs wrathfully forth a brisk tailor. “What be we? Knoten be we? dirt be we? Who says that, is an ass, and I say it!” A swarm of students that have rushed into the saloon raise a burst of hearty laughter. Then blazes the wrath of the Handwerksburschen;—“Brother Hamburger! brother Leipsier!” they cry. Numbers of them rush together, and strike with sticks, chair-legs, and bottles, at the little knot of students furiously, who grimly stand on their defence.

Whatever other duty of the day the student neglects, he never neglects to visit his beer-shop at night. Sometimes he plays billiards in the evening; and gaming, in a small way, is as frequent at some of the universities as at Baden and other spas.

Among other little helps with which Dr. Cornelius ekes out his work, is a discussion on phrenology, in which the German demolishes the “new science,” while the Englishman tries to defend its truth.—Quoth the traveller—

Gentlemen, recollect how often phrenologists, from the outward form of the skull, have drawn correct conclusions. Recollect the allocation of distinguished heads as they are to be seen in plaster in the English and German museums.

FREISLEBEN.—Yes, they have drawn some very neat conclusions, but we know very well how that stands. The false conclusions have been carefully put out of sight; and yet sufficient of them have come to the daylight to render the phrenologists ridiculous. They are, indeed, often still more innocent, the worthy demonstrators only seeing that which they knew very well before. Recollect also what a sagacious German naturalist says:—“The proof of the demonstration which the phrenologist makes is, in most cases, as superficial as the demonstration itself. Let a man eat a shovelful of salt, according to the prescription of Aristotle, with the person upon whose head and heart he makes so superficial a judgment, and he will then find what will become of his former judgment. But to err is human, and that not exclusively, for it is sometimes the fate of angels.” Talent, and the endowments of the spirit, generally have no signs in the solid portion of the head. To prove this, let the selected casts of thinking heads, and selected ones of fools and not-thinking men, be placed side by side; and not the head of the learned man, of a careful education, be placed in opposition to that of the worst specimen of the totally uneducated country booby. Bedlam is peopled with inhabitants, who, if they did not stand staring as if chilled into stone, or smiling at the stars, or listening to the song of the angels, or would blow out the dog-star, or stood trembling with folded arms,—if, in fact, they were not judged by these aberrations, but by the shape of their heads alone, would command the highest respect. Still less can we draw correct conclusions from the shape of the living head than from the bare skull itself. A skilful artist, without exceeding the bounds of the probable, would be able to cast in wax a covering of muscles and skin for the head of any skeleton, and give it an expression which would possess any aspect that he pleased.

... What an immeasurable leap from the exterior of the body to the interior of the soul! Had we a sense which enabled us to discover the inner quality of bodies, yet would such a leap still be a daring one. It is a well established fact, that the instrument does not make the artist; and many a one with a fork and a goose-quill would make better sketches than another with an English case of instruments. Sound manly sense soon sees into this; it is only the passion for innovation, and an idle sophistry, soothing itself with false hopes, which will not see it.

The rest we leave to those who care for the subject.

Next to being a terribly smoking people, the Germans are universally a singing people; and the students, who enjoy an affluence of songs, share the distinction. Take, says Dr. Cornelius, from Germany its wine, its songs, and yet a third particular of a less noble character, [Qy. Its beer, or its pipes?] and it will become quite another country.

The common man in Germany sings as he goes to his labour; he sings while he works, in order to enliven himself, and when he has concluded he naturally sounds forth his song of satisfaction. A pleasure, without the accompaniment of singing, he does not understand. Thus the foreigner, who has a taste for singing, hears, with surprise, a chorus-song resounding from a public-house, or passing along the streets, which might not sustain a very severe criticism, but which does all honour to the uneducated singers. So they establish themselves in the smallest villages into Gesang-vereine, (singing companies,) and the author recollects with particular pleasure, a serenade, which he heard in returning late one evening from Schriesheim, in the village of Handschuhsheim; and also the delightful choral-song, which a company of peasants and peasantesses, frequently raised in the summer evenings in the castle-gardens at Schwetzingen, and which in the stillness of twilight, when the splashing of the distant fountains were only heard besides, produced an extraordinary effect.

Thus it happens that songs of simple contents and of simple airs, spread themselves rapidly amongst the people, and by no other means in Germany can you so speedily operate on the popular mind as through the medium of such songs. In almost every different place you hear different songs.

The Bauer, the Handworker, the Sportsman, in short, each and all have their peculiar songs in abundance, which are never out of their mouths. Do all Germans then sing, and sing they everywhere! some one may ask. No, don't fear that you would actually be deafened with singing in Germany. The Bundestag, when it holds its sittings; the Landtag, when it is in debate; the statesman in the business of his office; the learned man writing his dissertation, and many other people, don't sing; in short, people do not sing in their solemn affairs, though the opera makes them do so. But amongst those who have nothing better to do, the little children who have yet no proper voices, or initiated ears for it, and the very old people who have partly sent their teeth before them into another world, are the only ones that don't sing. The young sing much, the care-free young still more; and the students perhaps most of all.

It is this also which gives heart to the student; and how can he who is called the son of the Muses, do otherwise than be obedient to his divine mother! The so-called Commerz-Books contain a rich collection of songs, so that the student can be in no embarrassment to find one suitable to the moment. He finds here a song adapted to every occasion, and to every mood of mind. Before all, social songs are in requisition when the students are assembled at their Kneip for a merry meeting. As the larger assemblies of this kind are called Commerz, so the song-books are called the Commerz-Books.

On this head we need not expatiate, as our readers must have obtained a good notion of the Commerz-Books from our pages,* where, within the last six months, these festivities are described.

The chapter on drinking customs starts with a text proper for debating in a Tea-Total Club:—"Have the gods drunk nectar—the gods, exempt from all the cares of mortal existence!—and shall then poor mankind be envied the enjoyment of their earthly nectar? No; not without cause was it celebrated by all the ancient poets. Even the great Reformer himself joined in its praise."

On this we have the translation of the song, Old Noah, which it is to be feared some of the Friends may judge to verge on the profane.

A special or extraordinary Commerz is often celebrated at some country inn, and forms a "great occasion." These solemnities are sometimes observed by the Heidelberg students at the sign of the Harp at Neckarsteinach; when a long train of youths is seen to approach, either by land or water, coloured caps shimmering, naked swords glancing, their barges or steeds decorated with ribbons and garlands, as we see in the procession of the May-Day London Chimney-Sweepers, or those of the carmen, gardeners, &c. &c., in many places:—

The inhabitants see gladly these guests arrive in the place; as the Burschen, on one such a day, make a greater expenditure, or in common parlance, moult more feathers, than as many honourable inhabitants of the little town do in a whole year. The whole house is in the most universal bustle. Heaservants and waiters run to and fro; in the kitchen all the hands of all the cooks are in active agitation, in order to fulfil the command of the landlady. There will sit a sleepy maid nodding in a chair, since for two days, that is, since the Commerz was announced to them, there has been no sleep in the eyes of any of the ministering spirits; but she is quickly roused up with a vengeance in order to assist in the general activity. All, however, is still and solitary in the yard; for the poor feather-cattle have been compelled to yield up their young lives, in order to parade on the table of these honoured and swarming guests. Above, in the great hall, is a long table covered. Every window is adorned with green and flowery garlands and festoons, and at that end of the hall where the seat of honour is placed, there is emblazoned on the wall the great and painted coat-of-arms of the Verbindung, embellished with flowers and ribbons. The musicians now take their places in the orchestra above; the sons of the Muses appear in the hall, and the feast is opened. After the cloth is drawn the proceedings at table are such as we have described in the General Commerz, except that, at this Commerz, no beer is drunk, but wine only; and you may soon hear the report of out-flying Champagne corks, as the toasts of the Chöre are given, or those, upon and connected with the Land Prince, when the Commerz is celebrated on his birth-day.

In the so-called Foundation Commerz, it is customary for the Senior to deliver a short speech, in which he takes a review of the fortunes of the Verbindung, or Chöre, from its establishment, and particularly mentions the names of those who have belonged to it, and are now gone forth from it into busy life.

As they do not return from such a Commerz, at the earliest, till the noon or the evening of the next day, all kind of follies and mad-cap playfulness are resorted to, to make the time pass merrily. Amongst these may be classed the "Lord of Fools." A great throne is built up of tables and chairs, upon which one of the students is placed. He is equipped as a king, with his crown, sceptre, and other insignia. The others are his devoted subjects, who bring him a great humpster, or large glass, such as every Chöre possesses. The Prince of Fools now sings.

A clever, lively, nonsense song follows :—

I am the Prince of Fooling,
Here o'er the toppers ruling ;
And ye, the gods, do send on,
My Princeship to attend on.

[All sing.] To wait on your divineness,
With wine of every fineness,
That's why we here are standing,
All at your dread commanding.

When this song is concluded, the Prince descends, and the next student takes his place, till the whole round is gone, and the High Jinks concluded :—

The convivial meeting sits till late in the night ; and the next day they amuse themselves with all kinds of frolics and merriments. . . . They sometimes make processions through the village, at the head of which one of them rides on the back of the Red Fisherman, or on an ass. They climb the neighbouring ruined castles, which are perched on the mountains, and let their songs thence resound over the country.

These gambols and outbreaks of youthful spirits, full of life, strength, and enjoyment, and which thus are ready to overleap all bounds in the excitement of leaving behind for a day or so all study, and giving themselves up in fine weather, and beautiful scenery, to the full swing of their fancies and feelings, especially such a troop of youngsters being together, have always characterized the students. . . . The Commers then, being brought to a close, they generally return by boat to the city of the Muses. If this is in the evening, the barge is illuminated, and when they approach the city, fireworks are played off. As they land they proceed to their Kneip, and there wind up the feast.

Pass we some long stories, and also the New Year festivities, to reach the student about to depart from Burschedom into the land of the Philistines. Up to the time of his departure, he is liable to be summoned forth, much in the manner in which the banded London 'Prentices, or the crafts of the Hans Towns, and of many other places, wont to be called out in cases of emergency. The slogan on these occasions is, "Bursch, come forth !" which is shouted in the streets by those who run on acting Fiery Cross. In 1827, some refractory or rebellious students of Heidelberg were ordered by the Grand Duke to be arrested, or placed in confinement in their lodgings. Their trial was begun immediately, and would have been completed in the same day, save for the general rise.

The ringleaders through the city, with a loud "Bursch, come forth !" draw the students together from all quarters, and rushed with them, with great uproar, into the front of the university, where the Senate had speedily assembled, and stood in presence of the tumultuous throng at an open window. Instead of applying to the Protector, as they should have done, had they ground of complaint, they even treated with contempt two summonses from the Senate to send deputies to explain their claims or demands, and immediately in the face of the Senate proceeded, with loud outcries, to make a desperate onset on the door of the adjoining academical buildings, with sticks and kicks, so that the upper beadle, to prevent further mischief, was obliged to liberate the incarcerated students. This being accomplished, they commenced their march forth towards Schwetzingen.

The whole city was in uproar. The shops were closed out of fear of the wild faction. Everywhere chaises rattled through the streets ; the boot-foxes ran here and there ; the inhabitants looked full of trouble out of their windows ; when a student, with his sword in his hand, galloped through the streets with the fearful cry—"Bursch, come forth !" Most of the students went along with the train, only because the Comment, or Students' Code of Laws, demanded it, without well knowing for what purpose. The wild throng rushed into the houses of the dilatory, in order to rouse them out of bed. Hastily, every one packed up what was most necessary and threw it into the carriage, or buckled it upon a horse ; and when no longer carriage or horse was procurable, the boot-foxes must become baggage-bearers.

In order to rouse all into a necessary degree of resentment, and to keep it up, the ringleaders circulated false stories. They spread it everywhere that the authorities had dragged the students out of their beds in the night ; that they had thrust them into a hole where none could stand upright, and where there was not a single seat to rest upon ; while the fact was, that they who were said to have suffered so much maltreatment in the night, were conducted to the academical buildings in clear daylight. Yet, in the excitement of the moment, these false reports found credit, and with the "Bursch, come forth !" which raged like a running fire through the streets, they availed, in a very short time, to bring the whole student host together.

They who were on horseback placed themselves at the head of the procession ; rode hither and thither, in order to quicken the motions of the dilatory, and to maintain the whole train in order. A long line of carriages followed them, of every description that could be got together in the haste of the occasion. Part were chaises, in which the students rode ; part were waggons, on which were hastily loaded their packages. All the students had armed themselves in haste, as well as they might, with swords, rapiers, and pistols. They who found no place in the carriages, or on horseback, went on foot, and a great swarm of boot-foxes followed, who were loaded with all kinds of house-gear, as pipes, dressing-gowns, coats, and so on. A vast crowd of people, consisting of school-youths, who had to thank the students to-day for a holiday, and of all kinds of people who, in a university city, draw support from the students, added themselves to the train, and increased the uproar and alarm, with curses and insults, that the students should be suffered to go away. The inhabitants of the city looked down in wonder and curiosity from their windows, roused from their sleep by the noise, and gazed on the motley throng who, with shouts and singing of Burschen-songs, swept by.

At length the rear of the train disappeared through the city gate, and a strange silence reigned in the deserted town. The doors opened, and the Philistines stepped out into the streets together, to talk over the fatal story.

The students marched into the territory of Rhenish Bavaria, and vapoured about for a day or two, after which the affair ended, like their duels, in smoke. A Marching-Forth from Göttingen in 1818, bore for a time a more serious aspect ; but of 800 recusants, 600, who were Germans, returned in a few days, and the rest, who were foreigners, were put under bann for two and a half years, which was, of course, virtual expulsion. The students have made little by their Marchings-Forth. Upon one occasion we find them assembling in a noble cause ; this was to defend the Jews of Heidelberg from an attack of the artisans, who were not much more enlightened in those times than an Orange nobleman of the present day, or the followers of Lord George Gordon. We wish the students may deserve the high commendation which Mr. Howitt gives them, when, in his preface, he compares them with Oxford men, to the infinite depreciation of the latter. What follows hardly bears him out :—

Another cause which often compels the students to quit the university, and indeed in all stillness, is debt. That the young men at the High-school may readily fall into debt, is easy to conceive. Most of them were till this time at schools where they were quite dependent on their parents, and have now, for the first time, considerable sums in their hands; and beyond this, the way into debt is made so particularly easy to the student. The landlords, the shopkeepers, and all others, who derive an advantage from the students, freely give credit or pump, as the students term it. They do it the more willingly, since it is a good opportunity to make the account a little larger, (since the English and students, as the student says, generally chop above the ear, that is, suffer themselves to be overcharged;) and moreover, the students look on it as a certain prerogative, of which many are compelled to avail themselves, who, especially in their first year, need more than their remittances. A master tailor who was much in mode amongst the students, once attempted to put an end to this silently acknowledged privilege, but it cost him dear. This man sent round a list amongst his colleagues, by which every one who signed his name, bound himself to give no more credit to any student. But this list had not circulated far, when the students became aware of the fact. They assembled themselves that evening at their kneip, armed with their swords, proceeded thence to the house of the tailor, dashed all the windows in, broke open the doors, and rushed into the workshops and store-rooms of the tailor; where they cut to pieces, and bored through all his pieces of cloth and ready-made clothes, so that they were totally ruined. The actors, indeed, were punished, and required to pay all the damages, but the tailor had for ever lost the business of the students, and his fellow tradesmen took warning from the transaction.

The academical laws have endeavoured to put a check on this facility of debt-making, by determining that all demands for credited wines and spirituous liquors, excepting the regular choppin of wine or beer set before his guests by the landlord or master of an ordinary,—all demands of the masters of coffee and billiard-rooms, as such,—all play debts, demands for carriage, sledge, or horse-hire for more than one journey, which may be made on students, shall not be recoverable in a court of law; and it is also enacted to what extent credit for all necessities of life, for books, and such things, may be given, so as yet to leave a legal right of recovery. In order to make themselves secure against a student, who, they are afraid, may attempt to quit without discharging his debt, the creditor is accustomed to take the usual and effectual way, that is, to go and lay an arrest on his departure-testimonial, which will then not be handed to the student by the university office, till he has paid his debts, by which means it becomes very difficult to quit the place without a fair settlement with his creditors. One way, however, remains for him. In the university cities are people who lend money to the students at a high rate of interest. These the student pumps, as he calls it,—and, as claims for money lent to students, are untenable before the court, these people generally get the loss when a student runs off, as well as all those other creditors who have not protested against the delivery of his testimonial. This burning through, or running through the rags, as starting without paying is called, was formerly much more frequent than at present. If it now sometimes happens, yet the cases are very rare in which they do not afterwards pay as soon as they are in circumstances to do it. When these escapes were made, it was generally at midnight; or in this manner,—the youth's companions accompanied him in a Comitat, or one of their regular departure-processions, but another student was set in the first carriage, in the place of honour, as though it were he who was leaving. When they had, however, quitted the city, the real departer took the place of honour, and the pretended one then quietly returned to the city. On such occasions was sung the song, of course not till the immediate danger was past—

Forth from here, the Manichæans watch us.

The Manichæans are the creditors, so called after the old much reprobated sect of the Manichæans, who in the third century held the doctrines of the Persian heretic Manes.

We do not mean to accompany the student to the grave, which Dr. Cornelius does with due solemnity; nor yet into the examination by the State, which usually closes Bursch life, and often converts the wild student in a little month into a sedate Philistine. The summary, or the view of the merits and demerits of student-life, contains some sensible remarks. We may state, in brief, that the merits are found to preponderate largely; and, moreover, that the German student is held, by his countryman, Dr. Cornelius, to be very superior, in character and acquirements, to the student of any foreign university. And hereupon follows an eulogium on the universities of the Fatherland. There is, no doubt, a great deal of smoking, quarrelling, fighting, and beer-drinking among the students; but then all the Germans drink and smoke, and duels are becoming less frequent, and are seldom or never fatal; and the beer, according to Mr. Howitt, though quaffed in large quantities, is neither potent in strength nor tempering in flavour. We are aware that it possesses no seductive qualities for Englishmen, and one has certainly more sympathy with the German student, joyous over his very bad beer, than with the luxurious Oxford dandy, regaling himself with iced champagne. There are still a few formal challenges given to a trial of prowess in imbibing; the young, lusty student generally challenging some noted toper of the Old School.

The Heidelberg beer is not strong, and it is cheap, and is on this account esteemed by the student, who is seldom rich. Amazing quantities of it are swallowed with impunity at these beer combats. Only on high festivals are wine, glee-wine,* and punch drunk. When the students drink their beer in summer in the open air, they pile up the empty flagons and jugs in a pyramid, as soldiers pile their arms. The Beer-Code occupies many pages in the volume. The laws which regulate a challenge of drinking are as clearly defined as those which regulate fighting duels.

From the Beer-Comment of Hiedelberg we meant to copy a few of the articles, to show to what extent clever young men may run into folly. The Beer-Code really displays a luxuriant fancy; but we stop short, wishing that Mr. Howitt had preferred giving us a work of his own, when the proper time came, instead of the voluminous compilation of Dr. Cornelius.

A SKETCH FROM MODERN HISTORY.

THE habitual readers of fiction hardly know how much they might gain of the peculiar excitement which is so dear to them, by turning at times to the history of actual life. They would find in its details no rare occurrence of the very elements that have moved them in fable; with others, not the least impressive, which belong to reality alone. These must be our reliance on the present occasion. No attempt will be made to ensnare the reader's sympathy by any disguise of plain historical truth; the effort, indeed, would be gratuitous. The incident, from recent Italian history, which we intend to relate, believing that it will be new to many in this country, is such as the invention of man has rarely devised. It would not be easy to add to the authentic narrative a single borrowed trait that would not impair its effect. What we have set down may, therefore, be securely accepted as the brief and literal relation of an "owre true tale;" on the threshold of which we only pause for an instant to offer a remark which may have occurred before now to many a student of Italian history and manners.

After the standard themes of classical story and mythology, it will be found that by far the most of the tragic subjects, which the poet or the moralist has taken from actual life, are of Italian growth. This can neither be the result of mere chance, nor be fully explained by the precedence, in time, of the Italian novelists and chroniclers before those of other European countries. The existence of a number of petty states, no doubt, encouraged the preservation of details, which the historians of a larger realm must of necessity have passed over. But the peculiar colour of these details, the frequency of strange and moving incidents in them, can only be accounted for by a reference to the national character. This it is not easy to portray, on account of the contradictions which meet every attempt to trace its features. But it is impossible to overlook its intemperance of nature, a tendency in it to the excessive, whether in good or evil,—a temperament volcanic like the soil on which it grows, distinguished no less by the luxuriance of its productions than by the convulsions that suddenly lay them waste. In the history of individuals the Italian nature presents itself in the strangest contrasts: vehemence more than childish, with a capacity for the most subtle and patient dissimulation: flaming passion, and slow-burning vindictiveness: intelligence of the quickest, readiest kind, not deep, yet never disturbed amidst the agitations of the moral faculties: a redundant sanguine flow of animal life, and a certain fervour of mind, such as belong to no other race with which we are acquainted. Their sorrows and crimes are nearly always marked by some unexpected trait: they display a kind of superfluous originality, (sit venia verbo), an ingenious fearfulness, which makes the adventures of other men seem tame in comparison with theirs. It is this property which gives its strange fascination to the darker figures of the history of Italy; and which prompts the inventor of any fiction more than usually appalling, to place his scene in this region, or to take from thence the chief mover of its events. The same undoubtedly guided our elder dramatists to the Italian novels and chronicles, which have furnished the matter of their deepest tragedies in such abundance as they would vainly have sought elsewhere. Deprived of its most enviable claims to distinction, this preëminence in the growth of occasions for pity and wonder Italy still retains. In a century counted back from the present year, although it will embrace the French Revolution and the disasters of Poland, it is in Italy that we still find the most affecting tragedies, the most curious displays of mysterious crime and imposture; the strangest extremes of human passion, suffering, and despair. The incident which is now to be related will not discover all these violent contrasts; yet, it is in many respects such as we hope and believe it would be impossible to parallel from any other page of the history of modern civilized Europe.

"E chi no'l piange, di chè pianger suole?"

A brief summary of some principal events of the time and place must first be given. In 1798, the King of Naples, in concert with England, Austria, and Russia, directed his troops against those of republican France, which had advanced as far as the Papal States. It was natural that Ferdinand should detest a nation stained with the blood of his royal kinsmen, and whose victories had shaken old thrones and privileges over all Europe. The period seemed to encourage a hope of assailing the French with success in Italy. The Austrians had effected a powerful diversion on the Rhine; the government of the Directory began to show signs of decay; the flower of its armies was in Egypt, and with it the young commander on whom the fortunes of the republic had rested at Arcola and Lodi. There seemed to be a pause in its successes, and men hoped that the day of its humiliation was at hand.

An army of 52,000 men, led by Mack, crossed the Garigliano, drove the French detachments out of Rome, and for a moment seemed to restore the cause of Absolutism in central Italy. But the triumph was only a brief one; and it ceased when the republican forces, collected under Championnet, repelled the royal advance, and became in turn the assailants. Against the fierce energy of the French, who had already begun to deem themselves invincible, what resistance could be opposed by unwarlike troops, incapable or treacherous generals, and a king who made no secret of his cowardice? The Neapolitan troops were driven back across their own frontier, and retreated from post to post, with hardly a show of defence. The capital was soon in danger. In vain did Ferdinand proclaim a levy en masse, and issue orders for a war of extermination upon the heretic invaders. His garrisons surrendered strong places almost before they were summoned; in the field his troops would not abide the face of the enemy, and laid down their arms in bodies of thousands at a time: the only impediment to the progress of the French was supplied by the natural difficulties of the country. The king fled, with his court, to Sicily, in December, 1798—so panic-stricken, that no plan of defence or resistance had been left for the kingdom which he abandoned. Championnet took possession of Naples in the January following; and amongst the few conditions in the show of a capitulation which preceded his entry, a principal one was the demand of the populace that the conquerors should duly pay "rispetta a San Gennaro!"

This was instantly followed by the establishment of the Parthenopean republic, which the nation, if so inclined, had certainly the fullest right to adopt, as the king had left to its own resources the country which he was unable to defend. But its institution was the work of a few, supported by foreign conquerors, if not wholly controlled by them. Enthusiastic minds, indeed, saw in this measure the regeneration of their country; and on the part of its promoters neither sincerity nor effort was wanting; during their short prosperity many good foundations were laid, and numerous abuses were abolished. It is notorious that, in Naples, at least, nearly all the virtue, learning, and intellect of the middle and higher classes espoused the republican party. But with the lower sort of people, and with the populace in the capital, still more throughout the provinces to the south, and in the smaller towns, it was never popular. The nation was, in general, blind to the uses of improvement, jealous of change, vicious, lazy, and ignorant; suspicious of those who were not so; fickle, sensual, and superstitious. This was no stuff from which a republic could be created, still less maintained against external force and intestine treason. It is a lamentable mistake to imagine that mere institutions can make a free people; overlooking that cardinal necessity of the virtues, without which, as Montesquieu truly declares, no republic is possible.

Moreover, it was mainly a work of the French, and ever since the Angevin times, the French have been hated in Naples. Even the Liberal party, whose establishment was owing to the invaders, accused them of treating the capital like a conquered city, which indeed it was. In this manner bickerings arose, and the time and energies were consumed which had been better employed in preparing to resist a common enemy. A discontented feeling, the most threatening symptom in a fickle nation, began to gain ground; the populace became noisy and mutinous, although the French general had wisely secured the obedience of the worst part of the Neapolitan rabble by investing with the rank of colonel Michele Pazzo, the head of the Lazzaroni. These disorders became formidable when, towards the month of July, a counter-revolution in favour of the Bourbon party broke out in different parts of the kingdom, where the republic had not as yet succeeded in establishing its authority to any extent. The first rising was in the Abruzzi, where some of the king's fugitive troops had remained unmolested since the arrival of the French. The example was followed by the Calabrians, and in Apulia; and the insurrection soon began to show its head in the Terra di Lavoro, the district immediately surrounding the capital.

Its commencement was with detached bands of partisans, recruited from the lowest and vilest of the people, and acting independently, each under its own leader. The heads of these guerrillas were men whose cruelty and ferocious wickedness soon made them terrible. There was but one amongst them who was not already branded with some notorious ignominy, or crime—Rodio, a lawyer by profession. The rest were taken from the dregs of the populace. Pronio, an unfrocked priest, had escaped from the galleys, to which a cruel murder had condemned him. In the Terra di Lavoro the leader was a notorious brigand, properly called by the peasants, on account of his cunning, boldness, and thirst for blood, Fra Diavolo; the wretch's real name was Pezza. But none equalled in atrocity one Gaetano Mammone, who infested the same district. The accounts which have been given of his sanguinary rage are hardly credible; it is said, (and, as Colletta asserts, on certain authority,) that he took pleasure literally in drinking human blood. At least four hundred Neapolitan and French are said to have perished under his hands; he would order any prisoners that his men had taken to be brought to him as he was feeding, and killed them for pastime during the feast. Such were the wretches who first raised again the banner of Ferdinand; and to the end of this struggle they, and others like them, formed the main native strength of his cause. We find Ferdinand and his queen writing autograph letters to them, in which neither disdained to use such titles as "my general," and "my friend!" After the restoration these ruffians were actually rewarded with commissions in the army, and offended public decency by appearing as majors and colonels of the line in the streets of the capital.

Such ferocities, however, were not solely confined to the Bourbonists; we meet with acts on the other side, which, for a moment, seem to take the reader back to the rudest period of the middle ages. One notable instance we may pause to relate; and this, be it remembered, took place not in a wild region, but in the immediate neighbourhood of Picerno, in Potenza, a considerable city, which is now the capital of a province. In this vicinity dwelt a bishop named Francesco Sersa, a good and learned ecclesiastic, who had, some years before, been persecuted by the Roman See, on alleged charges of Jansenism. At that time he was protected by the Court of Naples, but afterwards its policy changed, and he was kept at a distance, and in disfavour. From this cause he was generally reputed averse to the king's party, and a favourer of the republic: and the mere suspicion was enough to cost him his life, when the insurrection broke out. The episcopal palace was assailed, and the old man, found kneeling before a crucifix, was dragged into the street, slain, and his head paraded through the city on a lance's point. The assassins—seventeen in number—were none of them of the lower class. This atrocity was witnessed by a rich citizen of Potenza, one Niccolò Addone, a man of a fierce but wary disposition—attached to the bishop, and a devout catholic: although hitherto he had secretly espoused the republican cause, the fear of endangering his wealth in civil broils, had kept him aloof. But the outrage overcame his caution, he vowed to avenge it; and, being unable to effect his purpose by open force, he had recourse to artifice. Pretending, therefore, a great zeal for the Bourbon cause, and affecting to rejoice in the death of the bishop, he invited the assassins to a repast, in honour of the occasion. The house had been filled with a suitable number of accomplices, secretly armed, who were either posted in ambush in different places, or joined the company at table. After the guests had feasted and drank abundantly, the host gave a signal by himself stabbing the man who sat nearest to him; the others were instantly attacked, and slain on the spot. The most, it is said, Addone killed with his own hand. This deed, from which he expected praise, was denounced by even the warmest republicans, and Addone found it needful to take flight. For many weeks he concealed himself in the woods, and at last succeeded in escaping to France. He was seen twenty years afterwards in Naples, pardoned, rich, and busy as a spy and denouncer of political offenders to the officers of the restored Bourbon government!

The administration of the republic appears to have been feeble. The closet does not furnish the best statesmen; and a newly established power soon faints if it be not cordially supported by the people. The first interruption of the public tranquillity could not fail to disclose the secret of the government's weakness. The reaction gained force daily. In Apulia the imposture of some Corsican adventurers, one of whom personated the Prince Francesco, was successful in rousing nearly all the inhabitants. At last the fugitive king was encouraged to despatch Cardinal Ruffo into Calabria, as the leader of the royalist parties. He was a bad man, and an infamous priest; but his rank gave an air of credit to the insurrection; and the bigoted marauders joyfully obeyed a son of the church, who styled his levies, the "Army of the True Faith," and gave them absolution day by day for all the excesses which they had committed. The mob which followed him was soon numerous enough to be called a host; and as he advanced northward, the towns threw open their gates to receive him.

The coast, at the same time, was infested by an Anglo-Sicilian fleet, which attacked the strong places that still held out for the republic—landed troops and ammunition in the Bourbonist districts, and filled the maritime provinces with royal proclamations. In the north of Italy an Austrian army was hovering on the Adige, waiting the signal to attack: in Messina, General Siewart, with 3000 English, encouraged the partisans with hopes of speedy coöperation.

For a party whose chief reliance was on French support this was a dangerous state of things. Macdonald, who had replaced Championnet in the command at Naples, was unable to meet the swarms of Bourbonists, as they advanced, at all points; and the menacing aspect of the north compelled him to draw his forces together. After the arrival of the Russians had emboldened the Austrian army to force the passage of the Oglio, when Mantua was invested, Milan in danger, and a combined force of Russians and Turks, hot from the capture of Corfu and the Ionian Islands, had landed in the Capitanate, Macdonald thought it time to retire; and in May 1799, the greater part of his troops evacuated the kingdom.

This was a signal for the king's partisans to stir in Naples itself, which, up to this point, they had not ventured to disturb. A mechanic, nick-named Il Cristallaro, from his trade, now drew over to the royal cause a mob of lazzaroni—outcasts, indifferent on which side they acted, if it only gave them hopes of pay and plunder. One Tanfano, at the same time, collected a body of conspirators, and entered into direct correspondence with the king and queen, who replied from Palermo in the most affectionate terms to the vagabond's letters, and sent him money, with which he purchased new adherents. These men, and others, who now took up the same course of action, were, like the provincial partisans, for the most part disreputable and vile: and we see the nature of the movement, and the value of the success which it gained, in the fact that such was the most considerable support which Ferdinand received from his own subjects.

But while such conspiracies were in progress amongst the rabble, there was concerted a more dangerous and better cemented enterprise, by some royalists belonging to a higher order of society. The contriver of this plot was a Swiss, named Bekker, who, having long dwelt in Naples, and married there, had thus become connected with some families belonging to the most violent of the king's party. He was also personally attached to the Bourbons' service, in which he had held a commission; and his brother still bore the rank of captain in the dispersed army of Ferdinand. The man appears to have been exactly suited to the deed; a very adventurer, designing, bold, and unscrupulous. In the present temper of affairs he could not but see that there was a clear prospect of future profit and honour from a daring and fortunate attempt on behalf of the king; and no sense of pity or regard dissuaded him from putting it into execution. As soon as the allied fleet appeared on the coast, he entered into a correspondence with the admirals; and in concert (it is said) with them, arranged the plan of a royalist insurrection, which was to be brought about in the city of Naples. The scheme was well devised, but cruel and treacherous; and could only have been entertained by any number of persons above the class of brigands, in a nation the history of which had already recorded the tale of the Sicilian Vespers. It is impossible to believe that the English admiral (Foote) knew more of the design than that an armed rising was to take place on behalf of the king; or that he was in any way a party to the proposed acts of massacre and devastation.

The project was to choose some holiday, when the entire city, whose gaiety and thoughtlessness no calamity can long subdue, should be the least prepared for attack: at this moment the allied fleet was to appear in the bay, and bombard the defences of the harbour. The national guard would, of course, instantly rush in a body to the fortifications so assailed; and while the city was thus left without protectors, the insurrection was to break forth in all its quarters at once: in the midst of the tumult and surprise, the mutineers were to seize and assassinate all the principal men of the republican party; at the same time all the houses belonging to its partisans were to be plundered and delivered to the flames. Many took part in this terrible design in the mere hope of advancing their fortunes at the expense of a party which they disliked; some were attracted by the desire of license and plunder, and by the ferocity which delights in shedding blood securely; others (and these were the most formidable of all) had old revenges to satiate, and rejoiced in this opportunity of feeding them to the utmost: so many were the motives which swelled the conspiracy now levelled against the republic.

In order that the blow might fall with certainty, in a city so populous, where the confusion would be great, and the victims many, it was necessary to draw up lists of proscription, to direct the assassins in their work. The houses intended for destruction were also visited, and a mark affixed to each, on seeing which the agents of the conspiracy might confidently begin to burn and slay. But more than this was needful to ensure the full mischief that had been contemplated. Many houses were inhabited by more than one family; in some republican families there were royalist members, who might be destroyed, unless all were suffered to escape together, which was not to be thought of. To these it was consequently decided that passes should be secretly issued; which, being shown when the house or family was attacked, might secure them from the destruction which should fall upon the others.

It happened that Captain Bekker, brother of the chief leader in this plot, had for some time been enamoured of a young Neapolitan lady, whose family belonged to the republican party, named LUIGIA SANFELICE, well born, very beautiful, and of engaging manners. Although she would not listen to his entreaties or accept of his love, he did not abandon the suit, but persevered, hoping, perhaps, in time, to overcome her disinclination. It will not be imagined that his want of success arose from any coldness of nature in the young maiden: she was born in a climate the very air of which seems inspired with passion,—where love is the sole business of life to the sweeter sex; and she was not less formed to feel than to excite its warmest affections. But she had already bestowed her heart on a younger lover, a countryman of her own, named Ferri. He was an enthusiastic adherent of the new constitution, and had taken up arms in the national militia; but it would appear that some disparity existed between the circumstances of the lovers, or obstacles of other kinds, which deterred them from publishing their attachment, the secret of which was hitherto known to each other only.

In spite of his repulses, Bekker loved La Sanfelice sincerely; and she was the first person of whom he thought when the protections were named. He found an opportunity to speak with her alone during the early mass: and, repeating his oft-told tale of devotion, proved its sincerity by giving her one of the protections which have been described above. To explain the object and use of this gift, it was necessary to inform her of the approaching peril in which it was to be her security; and Luigia, although terribly alarmed, had nevertheless self-command enough to pursue him with inquiries until she had learned the principal circumstances of the design; after which she accepted the paper with thanks, concealing her agitation as well as she could. Bekker enjoined the utmost secrecy, and withdrew, hoping that he had saved his mistress, to requite him, perhaps, on some future day, for the service he had rendered.

She had, indeed, accepted the safeguard, but not to use it for her own safety. The danger of her lover, a declared partisan of the republic, and holding its commission, was the only object of her fears. To him she hastened, with all the unselfish eagerness of a young girl's love. She had already given him what was more precious than life, and had now no wish to be safe while he was in peril. It never occurred to her to ask herself if he would consent to use a protection thus obtained—if he would owe his life to an exception granted by assassins—or take a means of safety which left his mistress defenceless. To Ferri, therefore, she revealed the whole of Bekker's communication, and implored him to use the advantage which she had thus accidentally obtained. The young soldier listened to the breathless words of Luigia with no little surprise and emotion. Enchanted as he could not fail to be by so lovely a proof of her tenderness, he was, if possible, still more strongly affected by the danger, in its most hateful aspect, which threatened the liberties of his country and the lives of its defenders. He took her in his arms, and made her repeat to him again and again all that she had heard of the conspiracy, the names of its leaders, and the time and manner of its execution. As soon as the interview was over, he hastened, with the pass in his hands—a paper bearing two or three signatures—to discover the plot to the government: proud to think that to his love the cause of his country might owe its preservation. The Council of Administration, as soon as it had heard what Ferri could relate, required the attendance of La Sanfelice herself; and the bashful girl, who had little expected such a trial, was called upon to submit to a long interrogatory, in which the secret of her heart could not but be rudely torn open; while other fears of danger to herself and others, and of the suspicions of the government, agitated her, unused to such proceedings. She seemed to fancy herself or her lover in some way compromised, and in the most affecting manner besought the indulgence of the Council, which she hoped to conciliate by a full confession. She then repeated, as well as her agitation allowed, the substance of what she had confided to her lover, revealing all that she knew, excepting only the name of the party who had offered her the protection. She firmly declared that she would rather die than betray a friend whose care for her safety had led to the discovery. To Ferri even she had refused to tell his name; and jealous as the Italians are said to be, he did not attempt to overcome her silence. The Council forebore to press her upon this point; indeed, what they had already gathered from the story of Luigia, and the exhibition of the pass, rendered her reserve a matter of little moment. Several parties were instantly apprehended, before they had time to destroy their papers, and these were the means of discovering all the branches of the conspiracy. Its leaders and their agents were imprisoned, the needful precautions taken against surprise, and the thread of the intrigue in this manner wholly unravelled and broken. The circumstances and origin of this deliverance were now made known by the government; and Luigia, who had been trembling with the apprehension of public remark and censure, if not of punishment, suddenly found herself the object of the most enthusiastic praise and admiration. The friends of the new constitution vied with each other in evincing their gratitude by a variety of flattering compliments. When all particulars of the plot were declared, and the fatal marks recognised on most of the houses in the city, not excepting even the public buildings and the palace of the archbishop himself, the terror of the people enhanced their thankfulness to the author of the fortunate discovery. They followed her with vivas wherever she appeared; and their admiration of her youthful charms was not without its influence in aiding the enthusiasm which proclaimed her "the saviour of her country"—"the guardian angel of the republic." Luigia was more distressed than gratified by this public notice, and gladly escaped from applauses which she had not sought for, to the arms of her lover, surrendering herself to the transports of what she fondly thought a fortunate affection.

Alas! the repose of all who had attached themselves to the republic was not to last many days longer. Throughout the provinces the royal party had entirely recovered the ascendant. Cardinal Ruffo's horde was rapidly advancing towards the capital, where alone, and in a small circuit around its walls, the new constitution still maintained itself. The government despatched troops to act against the "Army of the Faith;" lukewarm, un-warlike, and led by inexperienced commanders, they were defeated and repulsed in almost every instance. At the entrance of the Bay might be seen the signal frigates whose evolutions betokened the near approach of the allied fleet. In spite of every attempt to preserve public order, the rulers of the sinking republic, as its disasters increased, were harassed by continual reports of seditious assemblages, and cries of mutiny which nightly alarmed the city; and the minds of its inhabitants, already awakened to a sense of the risk, were shaken with fears of sudden rapine and massacre. The few French troops which remained in the citadel were not even sufficient for its defence; they were intent on securing themselves alone, foreseeing that they would soon be insulated in the midst of enemies; and in the brief struggle which preceded the final overthrow of the republic, they took no part, but made for themselves a separate capitulation. Consternation, and a certainty of imminent misfortunes, seemed to have quenched whatever courage had existed, except in the hearts of a few. Amongst the needful orders for the array of the city in case of attack, it had been fixed that certain discharges of artillery, in one or more volleys, as the case might be, should be signals for the assemblage of the militia, the manning of defences, the clearing of the streets, or other suitable preparations. Of these, it was thought expedient to make trial before the real need should arrive:—the alarm signals were heard, and it seemed on the instant as if the whole heart of the city shrank and trembled:—the faces of men turned pale, as they slunk away to shelter themselves; and the streets, full and lively but a few minutes before, suddenly became deserted, and silent as the grave. When such was the general temper of the people, there remained no part for brave and virtuous men, (and there were many,) who had bound themselves to the republic, but to perish in a resistance which could not be animated by a single ray of hope. How this was fulfilled may be shown by one instance, which is chosen amongst many of a similar heroism. The army of the Cardinal had already invested the city, proceeding deliberately, with the avowed purpose of exciting more surely the fierceness of his troops by the prospect of deferred plunder—as he had promised them the sack of Naples. Such forces as the republic could collect were now fruitlessly contending at the outposts: their chief strength was composed of men not used to bear arms, who had devoted themselves to death in the defence of their country. Amongst these was seen Luigi Serio, an advocate, far advanced in years, and nearly blind, renowned for learning, eloquence, and deserved honours paid him by royalty in former years—but a hater of tyranny, and one who preferred death to servitude. On the first sound of the alarm, he called around him three nephews, who were inmates of his house, saying, "Let us go and resist the enemy." The young men, more timid and cold-blooded, would fain have dissuaded him from the attempt, objecting his feeble age, his want of sight, and the danger of going unarmed. The reply of the old man has been recorded:—"I have obtained from the Minister of War," he said, "four muskets, and two hundred cartridges. Let us come near enough, and I shall not fail to hit some one in the crowd. Do you follow me; and if we are not afraid of dying, we shall have at least the sweetness of avenging our country for a moment before death." They all went forth; the old man first of all, and in the hottest danger, fighting and encouraging his nephews to the last moment; he soon found the worthy death which he coveted, on the banks of the Sebeto. Strange, that the same country should produce armies of cowards, and prodigies of individual heroism!

It is needless to describe the contest which, after a struggle of three or four days, gave Naples to the invaders; having served at least to procure for the inhabitants the terms of a capitulation, and for the republican chiefs the permission to expatriate themselves, which was so cruelly and treacherously annulled on the arrival of Nelson with the allied fleet. But it must be mentioned that, in the last agony of the republic, while the enemy was already at the city gates, the revolutionary committee, having completed the investigation of Bekker's conspiracy, sentenced to death himself, his brother, and three of his chief accomplices. In the confusion of the time, and perhaps on account of the royalists, who had taken up arms in the city itself, the sentence was not publicly executed, but the criminals were shot within the fortress of Castelnuovo. They certainly deserved death, and the trial had been regularly conducted; but the clandestine manner of the punishment, and the circumstances of the time, made it unwise, hasty, and worse than useless—seeming more like the petulance of revenge than justice. The consequences of this mistaken act recoiled heavily upon the innocent being by whose means the treason had been discovered. Before the trials of the remaining accomplices had been completed, the republic fell; and they who were lately and justly treated as criminals of the worst kind, found themselves in a position to revenge themselves terribly on their accusers.

On the arrival of Nelson with the fleet, there was published an edict of Ferdinand's, declaring "that the King would not treat with his subjects;" annulling the amnesty and other solemn engagements made by his representative, the Cardinal; and threatening with the full weight of his vengeance, "the traitors," whose departure in the vessels that had already received them on board, was countermanded. After nearly a hundred had been selected from these, and imprisoned, the remainder were allowed to go into banishment. This cruel act of the king's loosed the turbulent violence of the Cardinal's troops, that had already been hardly restrained from breaking out. The plunder of the city began, and for many days it was delivered up to the most revolting excesses. It is actually declared, by an eye-witness, that on the 8th of July, in the Piazza del Palazzo, in open day, five men were thrown alive into a fire which these monsters had kindled, and that afterwards the roasted flesh was devoured by them! This last enormity, however, was so terrible, that it caused the adoption of immediate measures to check the license of the army and the populace.

To these atrocities succeeded the deliberate cruelty of the king. Of the part which Nelson, overcome by the blandishments of Lady Hamilton, took in these affairs, and especially towards Caracciolo, it is lamentable to think, and painful to speak. We willingly leave the relation of this shameful part of his history to other hands, and turn from it with sorrow and disgust. Tribunals were now constituted for the express purpose of doing speedy execution upon the political offenders who filled the prisons: informations were encouraged; the vilest passions called forth for the vilest purposes; and the vengeance of the king hardly preserved even a show of judicial inquiry. The sentences were cruel, and relentlessly executed; it was sufficient to have done any act under the republic, or shown any regard for its constitution, to incur the worst penalties; the lives of all who had not fled from Naples were at the mercy of a brutal king, servile and cruel ministers, and those amongst the vilest of the populace who had revenge to gratify, or profit to expect from false denunciations.

Of those victims of injustice none had a harder fate than Luigia Sanfelice. She saw her lover for the last time on the day before the city was assaulted: from this day she sought in vain for tidings concerning him. After a little while the names of those who had been apprehended as state criminals became known, and he was not found amongst the prisoners. He must therefore have fallen in battle, or have escaped to some other country, happy in either case to have been spared the indignities which awaited those upon whom the king's hands had fallen. But had he survived, some tidings would surely have been conveyed to one whom he passionately loved; and Luigia, at least, felt certain that her lover had perished in the fall of the republic. To this grief was added the misfortunes of her family, many of whom were expecting in prison the certain severity of the tyrant;—and she who was so lately beloved, admired, surrounded with kindred and friends, stood alone, a desolate heart-broken creature—with no one to counsel or assist her; in those cruel times, when youth, innocence, and womanhood were no protection. She soon had reason to feel how powerless they would prove in her own case. Amongst the edicts which had been promulgated by Ferdinand on the restoration of his power, was one, if possible, more odious and dangerous to all his subjects than any other,—for under it no man who had enemies was safe. It declared it to be a capital offence, punishable with death, to have done or contributed to any act on behalf of the republic, whereby injury or detriment had been inflicted upon any person. As soon as this sanguinary law, and the manner in which it was interpreted by Ferdinand's special tribunals, became known, some of the Bekker's relatives, rejoicing in the hope of revenge, accused La Sanfelice as having come within its danger, by helping to the discovery which caused their execution. This denunciation was sufficient, and the unfortunate young lady, trembling with shame and just apprehension, was dragged before a court, over the entrance to which might well have been placed that forbidding motto which the Florentine saw on the gates of hell—

Lasciate ogni speranza, voi che 'ntrate.

On Cardinal Ruffo's entry into Naples, he had immediately named a Giunta di Stato for the prosecution of the republicans, many of whom they condemned to death. The men who sat in this tribunal were servile and merciless, but even in their hands it seemed to the king that the sword did not fall fast enough,—and he added to the commission several others, amongst whom were three Sicilians, Damiani, Sambuti, and Vincenzo Speciale, men already practised in the work which was expected from them. The sessions of this body did not even cease during the night, and its sentences followed each other with frightful despatch. The following anecdotes of Speciale, the busiest of these agents, will afford some idea of the description of men before whom Luigia, feeble and terror-stricken, was called to plead against bitter and powerful accusers, and in what manner the functions of justice were exercised by them.

One of the prisoners brought before him, Nicola Fiano, was so fortunate that the most ingenious wresting of the law (as it was called) could not supply any reason for condemning him;—but the king had sent orders that he must die; and the judge brought it about in this manner. He had known Fiano in former years,—and having ordered him to be brought from prison privately, when he appeared, he exclaimed, with feigned emotion: “Is it you?” and ordered the fetters to be removed. “Alas! Fiano,” he said, when they were left alone, “what a position for both of us! when we used to enjoy the pleasures of youth together, we little thought that a time would come when I should have to judge you as a criminal! But it is fortunate that fate has placed the life of a friend in my hands. Forget my office, and your misery,—let us talk as friend to friend,—let us devise the means for your escape. I will repeat what you must declare and confirm for this purpose.” Fiano wept, overcome with joy and gratitude, and Speciale tenderly embraced him in return,—a secretary was called, and took down the words which Fiano had been advised to utter; and which supplied what was wanting to bring him within the letter of the law;—there was not a word of truth in the declaration, and the unfortunate dupe was thus beguiled to his own destruction, under the pretence of friendship.

There was another prisoner whom it required no device to convict, of the name of Francesco Conforti. He was, however, a learned man; and was thought to have composed an unassailable defence of the Neapolitan crown against the pretensions of Rome, (which, it will be remembered, have been matters of contest ever since the time of Sixtus V.) But the manuscript had been lost, and it was deemed worth while to entreat him to rewrite so valuable a state paper; which Speciale induced him to do, by positive and solemn assurances that after it was done, he should be not only liberated, but highly rewarded. With this hope the prisoner, removed into a commodious cell and supplied with the needful books, toiled day and night to complete the work,—which he lost no time in handing to the judge. On the same day that Speciale got possession of the MS. he ordered the trial of Conforti to proceed, and instantly passed on him sentence of death, which was executed a few days afterwards. Such were the men on whom the destiny of this unprotected creature now rested. They had lately proclaimed that her sex would procure her no indulgence, by ordering to be hung Eleanora Pimentel,—a lady distinguished beyond most women of her day for poetical talent, learning, and eloquence,—her offence was having written with spirit and genius on behalf of the republic.

Luigia's trial was a very short one. The part which she had borne in the detection of Bekker's conspiracy was described; of this she could deny nothing, except the assertion that she had revealed the name of the captain. The judges, without the least hesitation, pronounced her guilty under the king's edict, and she was carried back to her prison under sentence of death.

In so terrible a strait the instinctive love of life prompted her to betray a secret, which even this motive hardly could force her to reveal. It was only after a long struggle that the instinct prevailed, and she pleaded in arrest of execution that she was destined to become a mother—a confession almost bitterer than death itself, for she still bore her maiden name, and not her lover's. An examination of her person confirmed the plea; and as there is no law so merciless as to decree death to the innocent unborn, the judges reluctantly arrested the execution. The king, who had returned to Palermo, received regular reports of the proceedings in every case; and on reading these, ordered an angry reproof to be addressed to the Commission, declaring that the examiners had been misled, or had lent themselves willingly to a plea which was falsely advanced as a means of escaping punishment. Again the unhappy girl was subjected to the indignity which she had already undergone—with the same result: her pregnancy was asserted to be beyond doubt. But the unmanly and brutal monarch was not satisfied even with this, and showed an inveteracy against her which would have been shameful had she indeed been a criminal, and not, as she really was, innocent as her own unborn infant of any state offence. He commanded that she should be transferred to Palermo, there to submit to the inquiries of his own physicians: she was sent thither, and their testimony repeated that of the previous witnesses. The king angrily relaxed for a while his grasp of the victim, who was suffered to exist in prison until the birth of her infant should take place, and bid the unhappy mother prepare to die.

Meanwhile the miserable city of Naples lay quivering under the blows of the executioner. All that the cruelty of cowardice (and there is none more implacable) could perpetrate, was now experienced. More than three hundred of her most distinguished inhabitants perished on the gallows or the scaffold, amongst whom were found the illustrious names of Caraffa, Riario, and Colonna—men the most eminent in science and letters—and others who were the charm of society and the hope of many families. The extent of the devastation may be calculated when it is remembered that the republican party in Naples drew nearly all its strength from the classes most adorned by learning, genius, and social accomplishment. In Italy, at least of late years, the partisans of absolutism have rarely been found amongst the notables of the land. The furious defenders of Ferdinand were brigands and lazzaroni, the vicious and ignorant of the classes above them, scandalous churchmen, unprincipled lawyers—nobles who only approached the throne to hide their own insignificance beneath its folds. Well may the historian exclaim that there was never a city or nation, how rich soever in genius and worth, that would not have been impoverished by a calamity so universal! But this was not all that it suffered; other hardships and injustices were inflicted, which, if less fatal to the prosperity of the State, were nevertheless humiliating and intolerable. These cannot be better described than in the following extract from the account of an eye witness:—

“Together with these bloody trials, others of lesser moment were despatched: sentences of imprisonment, of confinement within certain districts, and exiles innumerable. Amongst the banished might be seen men tottering with age, youths or children whose age did not exceed twelve years; ladies, matrons and maidens. And all this innocence chastised—one for having the hair cut in a particular fashion, or wearing beard on the chin; another for partaking in some republican ceremony—the women for having distributed succours to the sick and wounded. Nor amidst such a lust for punishment was there wanting the urgency of private hatred or avarice—procuring, under pretence of State necessity, the exile of the creditor, the competitor, the rival: for which reason domestics and inmates, friends and kinsmen, nay, even brothers and wives were suborned or encouraged to act as traitors and spies. Morals, already depraved by the older condition of the kingdom and by other more recent causes, were finally in this year, 1799, utterly destroyed by such innumerable examples of virtue punished and prosperous wickedness.”—Colletta, vol. ii. lib. v.

Yet the reign which this tyranny was intended to secure, was torn in little more than five years from its unworthy possessor. Hardly was the feast of vengeance begun, when the sounds of approaching danger were again heard. A few months more, and Napoleon, returned from Egypt, made France resume her confident and menacing attitude, and the voice of coming retribution was borne to the ear of Ferdinand from the plains of Marengo.

Throughout the winter Luigia languished in the prison of Palermo, and in the spring of the following year gave birth to a child. There was nothing now to delay the execution of her sentence, as soon as she was strong enough to be raised from her bed. But the king was by this time busied with external affairs, the first heat of vengeance had had time to cool, and might have ceased to seek for more victims. All who had known and loved the unhappy girl were not slain or banished; her case had excited commiseration even amongst strangers; and exertions were made in secret to procure a reversal or mitigation of the penalty to which she had been condemned. Her friends succeeded at length in gaining the ear and awakening the compassion of the young princess Maria Clementina, lately married to the heir-apparent, Francesco—a lady of gentle and affectionate dispositions, and said to be an especial favourite of the king. Through her intercession, which was cordially offered, it was hoped that a pardon might be obtained for one whose only fault was that she had loved too well, and whom neither manly feeling, nor even the sternest justice could condemn. The princess, herself about to become a mother, was perhaps excited to a warmer sympathy with Luigia's sufferings by this circumstance, and only awaited a favourable occasion to interpose on her behalf. This was soon afforded during the rejoicings on the birth of an heir to the crown, of which she was confined in the month of June. The manner in which she attempted to fulfil her amiable purpose was not less touching than well chosen.

In the royal house of Naples there has long prevailed a remarkable usage, on the birth of an heir to the throne. The event is celebrated by a formal visit of congratulation, which the king pays to the mother, as soon as she is able to receive it, and before she has so far recovered as to leave her bed. On this auspicious occasion, the princess has the privilege of claiming from the sovereign three notable and peculiar graces, which are to be chosen by herself, and which, however difficult to grant, have rarely, if ever, been refused. This sounds more like romance than reality, but historians assure us that it is literally true. Availing herself of the established custom, the amiable Princess Maria chose for her request on this occasion the pardon of La Sanfelice; and in order to enforce it more certainly, and to convince the king of the earnestness of her petition, she combined in this one entreaty all the three which the privilege of her state allowed her to have made. A petition from the unfortunate prisoner, followed by an eloquent supplication, signed by the princess's own hand, was so placed within the clothes of the newborn infant, that it was immediately observed by the king when the child was presented to him. He appeared to be in the happiest temper; and after the usual ceremonies, took the baby in his arms, admiring its stoutness and beauty, on which he complimented the princess in the manner most pleasing to a young mother's ear. In the midst of these congratulations he noticed the paper attached to the child's dress, and asked what it was! “It contains a petition,” the princess replied, “which I now implore from your Majesty:—a single grace, instead of three, so earnestly do I desire its fulfilment of your Majesty's generosity!”—The king, still smiling and gracious, inquired, “For whom do you make this petition?” “It is for the unhappy Sanfelice,” the princess said, and would have proceeded to urge the suit further, but for the severe and threatening aspect of the king, which alarmed her into silence. His countenance underwent a repulsive change on the instant of Luigia's name being pronounced. Darting a suspicious and terrible look at the princess, he laid, or rather, in a kind of fury, (says the narrator of this interview,) dashed down the infant on its mother's bed, and without speaking a word, abruptly left the chamber. It was some time before he consented to see either the princess or her child again. This ungenerous and cruel behaviour alarmed the princess as much as it distressed her; and she wept bitterly as she related to Luigia's advocate the repulse which she had met with, and abandoned all hope of subduing the implacable ferocity of the king. His temper was too well known in his own family to encourage the princess, timid, unsupported, and a stranger, to risk a second attempt. This, at all events, he was determined to prevent. Recalled by the petition to a purpose which he had perhaps forgotten, he instantly issued an order for the removal of La Sanfelice, without delay, to Naples, where the punishment decreed by the Council of State was to be immediately carried into effect. Thither, accordingly, she was conveyed, while yet drooping and enfeebled by the pangs of child-birth—and faint she was dragged to the infamous Piazza del Mercato—the scene of countless murders done under the name of justice;—

Here, to this place, in the open air, before
She had got strength of limit:
and there died, an innocent and early victim, under the axe of the executioner. The murder was acted in the presence of a terror-stricken and weeping crowd, many of whom, hardly a year before, had followed her with acclamations, as she passed through the rejoicing city, radiant with beauty and happiness!

So perished, by the brutal fury of a tyrant, in the first year of the present century, a young, fair, well-born Neapolitan lady,—innocent of all offence, and only unfortunate in loving too fondly, and living in evil times and amongst evil men. This outrageous wickedness was perpetrated in the presence of thousands of men, who knew that she was guiltless and helpless, and a woman, and yet could look on, and see it done! And this, be it remembered, took place in no heat of public commotion or anarchy, but with the resolved deliberation of a settled power, under forms of law,—and by the express command of “the father of his people.”—A grave and disheartening subject for reflection! and yet, if rightly considered, as a lesson not without its uses. It is well to know to what extremes the abuse of power may be carried. And if men of ardent tempers, impatient of such a prospect, have been betrayed into passionate invectives against tyranny and servile obedience, let their excuse be found in instances like this; of no imaginary excess, nor borrowed from distant times,—showing how wretched may be the condition of a people yielding itself to absolute power, when the ruler is cowardly, selfish, and vindictive.

As a matter of tragic interest merely, may we not repeat that invention could hardly have contrived a sadder tale? As a trait of national history, may we not ask, in what other European country could a tale like this be told by men who are yet alive? Let us entreat those who can weep over scenes of fancied sorrow, to linger for a moment by the grave of a real sufferer, and bestow on her the simple lament which you still hear when her story is told in Naples,—MISERA SANFELICE!

V.

SANATORY INQUIRIES AND PROPOSED LEGISLATION.

DIFFICULT as it is to legislate for the conduct of man towards his fellows, the problem is vastly more puzzling when we attempt to regulate what is, or what appears to be, man's duty towards himself. When we ordain, that if John beat James he shall be whipped, we enlist a most powerful agent for the enforcement of our statute in the person of the aggrieved James, whose anger at the infliction and dread of its repetition are more serviceable in the vindication of the law than an army of policemen and an array of crown lawyers. If it is our will, however, to legislate that John shall duly wash and shave himself, wear clean linen, eat wholesome food, and live in a well-ventilated house, we not only lose the services of our universal vindicator of the law, but we evolve a nice question, whether, in the case of the said John preferring, for his own reasons, to be dirty and unshaved, to eat garbage, and to breathe foul air, it is any concern of society to put itself to expense and trouble to make him accommodate his habits to the taste of legislators, to his own inconvenience and annoyance.

As in many other cases, where legislation would be baffled if it were driven back upon first principles, experience and practice enable us to solve a considerable portion of the difficulty. If we find that there is one portion of the population, whose senses are sedulously protected from all external objects of an offensive and degrading cast, while there is another who not only do not receive such protection, but are liable to be invaded by the impurities driven forth from the precincts of their more influential fellow-citizens,—here is a clear case for interference—a case for equal laws and equal administration of them. There is scarcely a city of considerable size in the empire, that has not its aristocratic quarter distinguished from "the districts inhabited by the lower classes." In the former the streets are cleaned and drained; in the latter they are allowed to retain all the impurity that poverty and crowded mortality create in their vicinity. But this is not all. If a noxious manufacture, or any great depôt of filth, is to be established, the "better classes" will hunt it with legal opposition from spot to spot, until it exhaust itself in attempting to get rest in their domain, and then it has one of two alternatives,—to betake itself to some uninhabited spot, or to nestle in a crowded district inhabited by the poor. Which of these it may adopt, is all one to the law: in its eyes, a district inhabited by people who cannot afford to litigate is virtually a desert. De non apparentibus (that is people who have not a few hundreds to appear with in court) et non existentibus, eadem est ratio. Witnesses, before the Select Committee of last Session on the health of towns, said, there were many establishments for bone-boiling and manufacturing manure in the most crowded districts of London,—Lambeth, Christ-church, &c. One gentleman, Mr. T. Moseley, described the heaps of animal refuse rising as high as the surrounding houses. "They make the manure," he says, "by rapid decomposition."

They expedite the decomposition by the use of lime; and this consists in extracting foul air, sulphuretted hydrogen gas, which is of all gases most pernicious to health.

It is shortening the days of hundreds." The witness further observes—"It seems to me, that if they were in a better neighbourhood they would be indicted for the nuisance: but they are in the midst of a poor population."

Scotland is in a worse position even than England in regard to the power of putting down nuisances. In the south, the method of indictment may be had resort to, which, if it do present its difficulties and imperfections, yet has two good qualities,—that it allows the public interest to be pleaded, and embodies the expeditious procedure of the criminal law. In Scotland, a noxious manufacture may desolate a district; yet it is only a private question between man and man. There is a manure-manufactory in Edinburgh, behind the West Port, where the animal refuse of slaughter-houses and tanyards is fermented in tanks with the liquid of a common sewer. In a hot day, a heavy sickening stench fills the vicinity, which is thickly inhabited; but it is beyond the power of law to interfere, unless some one of the sufferers is prepared to go to the Jury Court with a thousand pounds or so in his pocket. Were such an operation attempted close to Moray Place, some means would be found to extirpate it. Yet so imperfectly is the public protected in this respect in Scotland, that even the comparatively wealthy are baffled where the profit from the abomination is large and the perpetrators are of the highest class. Some proprietors near Edinburgh, having among their numbers a Peer and a Member of the Commons, enrich their fields by irrigating them with the contents of the common sewers; and all attempts to put down the nuisance are met by a demand to let it continue or give compensation, i. e. a sum of money equal to what may be made by such a practice. This is the principle of compensation caricatured. It is as if the highwayman, when put down by the law, were to seek the value of the purses he might have obtained by continuing his career. It is the circumstance that it is an offence against the public, and therefore a thing that none but legislators can do, that gives the practice its value. If everybody were at liberty to spread forth so offensive a material and make property of it, it would not be a monopoly in the hands where it is; indeed it would not reach them, but would be part of the property of the city, administered by the police authorities. It is a fact that must come out with important influence when the practical evils of our present legislative machinery are more rigorously exposed, as they must soon be, that the noble and the honourable lawgiver, were, by their personal influence in committees, not only able to baffle every legislative endeavour to abolish the practice, but that they got inserted in every act that had reference to their neighbourhood, a clause prohibiting interference with the practice, that they might plead legislative sanction for it.*

But to return to those cases where the poor are the peculiar sufferers: Independently of scientific discoveries and statistical inquiries, civil history provides us with materials in which we can see exemplified the fearful evils of just such crowded and impure collections of dwellings as the working-classes are now doomed to inhabit. When any epidemic, whether it might be the plague or the sweating sickness, broke forth, it went on with its career of death unchecked, and associated itself with appalling notions of general and indiscriminate destruction, now fortunately unknown. The adoption of cleaner habits and better dwellings among the richer classes has served to isolate such visitations. There are clearings, as it were, here and there, that break up the burning forest, and check the flame before it can envelop the whole mass. Thus are epidemics narrowed in their field; and though they fall cruelly on the busy hive where they alight, they have ceased to make the simultaneous devastation that gave them historical dignity. But the higher classes have not got an entire indemnity. If they be not liable to be whelmed, as of old, by the flame, they get a sinner occasionally to remind them of that great law of human dependence, that no class can with impunity dismiss another from the benefits of protection and mutual good offices. We speak not so much of the infection that may find its way to the well-fed and well-clothed, as of the circumstance, that a filthy and diseased population will be a barbarous and dangerous one. Bentham beautifully

* Nay, in the drainage bill, which, while we write this, has passed the House of Lords, they have been able to get the usual clause inserted: in an act for the protection of the public health, they have got a clause to sacrifice that health so far as injury to it is profitable to themselves! Whoever may be the Members for Edinburgh and Leith, they will sadly neglect their duty if they allow such a clause to pass in the Commons without a struggle.

says in one of those passages which few expect to find in his works :—"Between physical and moral delicacy, a connexion has been observed, which, though formed by the imagination, is far from being imaginary. Howard and others have remarked it. It is an antidote against sloth, and keeps alive the idea of decent restraint, and the habit of circumspection. Moral purity and physical are spoken of in the same language; scarce can you inculcate or commend the one, but some share of the approbation reflects itself upon the other. In minds in which the least grain of Christianity has been planted, this association can scarce fail to have taken root: scarce a page of Scripture but recalls it. Washing is a holy rite: those who dispute its spiritual efficacy will not deny its physical use." A people may exhibit qualifications for which mere outward cleanliness of habit would be a poor exchange; but in that minor virtue there is always one great advantage, that its existence checks the career of degradation at a certain point. Religion, morality, education, have their higher spheres of protection; but when none of these is at hand, in this despised virtue there is a check before the utmost stage is reached. Now, it is a sad fact, that in the crowded spots, to which our complicated system of society compels our working people to throng, they cannot, be they ever so anxiously inclined, protect themselves from the contamination of filth, and are thus despoiled of one of their means of holding on by respectability,—a hard enough task sometimes when their facilities for it are unimpaired.

But undoubtedly the most directly important aspect in which the evil appears, is the amount of disease and death occasioned by it. In one of the papers on the subject, by Dr. Southwood Smith, we have the operative causes thus lucidly and scientifically laid open :—

It is known to every one that the putrefaction of vegetable and animal matter produces a poison, which is capable of exerting an injurious action on the human body. But the extent to which this poison is generated, the conditions favourable to its production, and the range of its noxious agency, are not sufficiently understood and appreciated.

It is a matter of experience that, during the decomposition of dead organic substances, whether vegetable or animal, aided by heat and moisture, and other peculiarities of climate, a poison is generated, which, when in a state of high concentration, is capable of producing instantaneous death by a single inspiration of the air in which it is diffused.

Experience also shows that this poison, even when it is largely diluted by admixture with atmospheric air, and when, consequently, it is unable to prove thus suddenly fatal, is still the fruitful source of sickness and mortality, partly in proportion to its intensity, and partly in proportion to the length of time and the constancy with which the body remains exposed to it. Facts without number, long observed, such as the great amount of sickness and mortality in marshy districts, the fevers and dysenteries incident to armies on their encampment in certain localities, several hundred men being sometimes seized with disease in a single night, and great numbers dying within 24 or 30 hours; the dreadful destruction which occasionally took place in ships' crews, in ships in which cleanliness had been neglected and especially in which the bilge-water had been allowed to collect and putrefy, sufficiently attested the presence, in certain situations, of a deadly poison. But this poison was too subtle to be reduced to a tangible form. Even its existence was ascertainable only by its mortal influence on the human body; and, although the induction commonly made as to its origin, namely, that it is the product of putrefying vegetable and animal matter, appeared inevitable, seeing that its virulence is always in proportion to the quantity of vegetable and animal matters present, and to the perfect combination of the circumstances favourable to their decomposition, still the opinion could only be regarded as an inference.

But modern science has recently succeeded in making a most important step in the elucidation of this subject. It has now been demonstrated by direct experiment that, in certain situations in which the air is loaded with poisonous exhalations, the poisonous matter consists of vegetable and animal substances in a high state of putrescency. If a quantity of air in which such exhalations are present be collected, the vapour may be condensed by cold and other agents: a residuum is obtained, which on examination is found to be composed of vegetable or animal matter in a state of high putrefaction. This matter constitutes a deadly poison. A minute quantity of this poison, applied to an animal previously in sound health, destroys life, with the most intense symptoms of malignant fever. If, for example, ten or twelve drops of a fluid, containing this highly-putrid matter, be injected into the jugular vein of a dog, the animal is seized with acute fever; the action of the heart is inordinately excited, the respiration becomes accelerated, the heat increased, the prostration of strength extreme, the muscular power so exhausted that the animal lies on the ground wholly unable to stir, or to make the slightest effort; and, after a short time, it is actually seized with the black vomit, identical in the nature of the matter evacuated with that which is thrown up by a person labouring under yellow fever. By varying the intensity and the dose of the poison thus obtained, it is possible to produce fever of almost any type, endowed with almost any degree of mortal power.

It is proved further that, when this poison is diffused in the atmosphere, and is transported to the lungs in the inspired air, it enters directly into the blood, and produces various diseases, the nature of which is materially modified, according as the vegetable or the animal matter predominates in the poison. In the exhalations which arise from marshes, bogs, and other uncultivated and undrained places, vegetable matter predominates: such exhalations contain a poison which produces, principally, intermittent fever or ague, and remittent fever.

The exhalations which accumulate in close, ill-ventilated, and crowded apartments in the confined situations of densely-populated cities, where no attention is paid to the removal of putrefying and excrementitious substances, consist chiefly of animal matter: such exhalations contain a poison which produces continued fever of the typhoid character. There are situations, as has been stated, in which the poison generated is so intense and deadly that a single inspiration of it is capable of producing instantaneous death; there are others in which a few inspirations of it are capable of destroying life in from two to twelve hours; and there are others, again, as in dirty and neglected ships—in damp, crowded, and filthy gaols—in the crowded wards of ill-ventilated hospitals, filled with persons labouring under malignant surgical diseases, and some forms of typhus fever—in the crowded, filthy, close, unventilated, damp, undrained habitations of the poor—in which the poison generated, although not so immediately fatal, is still too potent to be breathed long, even by the most healthy and robust, without producing fever of a highly-dangerous and mortal character.

This gentleman and his professional brethren speak with great confidence of the practical diminution of disease wherever drainage and other sanatory measures have been introduced. He mentions a district along High Street, Aldgate, where on one side of the street there are several slaughter-houses. A sewer was made, and the butchers were "with incredible trouble" prevailed on to open drains into it. From that moment it appears that there was a marked difference in health between that spot and the cluster of courts and lanes on the opposite side of the same street. "I have," says Dr. Smith, "myself very recently attended several families in these courts labouring under the worst forms of spotted fever; but I have neither seen nor heard of a case on the opposite side of the street, whereas there is hardly any part of Bethnal Green or Whitechapel in which fever has been more prevalent or fatal than in the streets, courts, and alleys which go off from High Street, Whitechapel, continuous with High Street, Aldgate, to which the before-mentioned sewer does not extend." And before the Committee on the Health of Towns, he says, "If you were to take a map and mark out the districts which are the constant seats of fever in London, as ascertained by the records of the Fever Hospital, and at the same time compare it with a map of the sewers of the metropolis, you would be able to mark out invariably and with absolute certainty where the sewers are and where they are not." Dr. Neill Arnott gives like illustrations from his experience of the direct efficacy of drainage.

There is no doubt that there is another powerful aid to these terrible diseases in the places where they appear—poverty. The hale, well-fed, warm-clothed man will bid a defiance to the same infectious influences that will strike down the attenuated frame of the hand-loom weaver. "I believe the want of nourishing food," says Dr. Arnott, in evidence before the Committee, "would be one of the causes rendering these exciting causes active, and is of as much consequence as any of the causes that have been mentioned. Want of food would weaken the health of the parties, and render them more susceptible to injurious impressions." But this is not a discussion on the subject of a provision for the poor: and it is sufficient to justify a call for amendment in the particular department we have under our view, to know that the partial and insufficient police regulations in the poorer neighbourhoods have their effect, however small, on the health of the people.

We have looked to the subject so far only as respects bringing the poor on a par with the rich in the matter of police law, within the proper province of which we count the cleansing and drainage of the districts in which they live. It may be said that this cannot be done without taxing the rich; but if there were no answer to such an objection on the ground of public policy, there is a good one on the ground of compensation; for by reason of the heavy duties on their articles of food, the poor pay, in the general taxation, far more than their proportion, as measured by the quantity of property they have to be protected. But there is another and nicer question to deal with—whether the position of the working classes does not authorize and require an extension of sanatory regulations, of a nature not calculated to be of benefit to the rich. We have spoken above of the difficulty of legislating for anything like private habits and arrangements—man's duty towards himself. But even if the progress of legislative discovery, keeping pace with that of mechanical invention, should present a simple plan whereby each labouring man should be taken in hand of a morning, and duly shaved, washed, and dressed, sent forth a presentable person to his work, it is much to be questioned if a real step in the elevation of the human race could be gained. There are two sorts of civilisation. There is that which comes ab extra, and makes the man smooth, docile, and suited to the views of those who administer it; a sort of domestication of one part of the race to adapt it to the tastes and uses of the other. There is a second and a higher civilisation, where the germs of improvement that repose in the bosom of the human animal are allowed free growth by the removal of the impediments and restrictions by which the selfishness and callousness of society endeavour to press them to the earth. Educated Prussia calmly submitting to a despotism, is a proof how possible it is to impart to man the highest element of civilisation in such a form as to leave his nature unraised from the original dust. Whenever we try to adapt the rule and the square to the adjustment of the conduct of the masses of a country, we may give an outward air of improvement, while we sap the foundations of future progress by the removal of independence and self-reliance.

Had the position of our working-classes, gathered by the cupidity of their employers into dense masses, been earlier looked to, there might have been less danger of incurring the risk of over-interference than at present, when the evil has so fearfully accumulated. The rapid progress of our manufactures brought workmen from the rural districts, who left one social system without coming under the discipline of another. In their native places they had their old-world traditional code of morals and habits, sanctioned by the example and superintendence of neighbours and relations. In the manufacturing towns they found a hurriedly-collected population with no social ties, no influence on each other, or knowledge of each other's character. Those who called them thither were too busy to look to anything but the work that was produced; and it is now when they have time to look about among the masses they have concentrated, that they become alarmed at the disorganized elements they have brought together, and are exerting themselves to infuse order and civilisation into them.

It is pretty evident, that without an undue interference with independence, there might have been measures taken to protect these masses from some of the physical evils of a hasty concentration. Many of these evils arose from the cupidity of persons in a position to take advantage of the circumstances. Landlords and builders, seeing the need of multitudinous dwellings for the accumulating cities, contrived means for getting as many human beings as possible to be their respective tenants, and packed them as close together as they could be brought. Hence come the undrained, rickety, floorless cabins, built back to back along unventilated courts, so often mentioned in the evidence on the health of towns. In these there is no respect to health or the means of cleanliness, and they keep around their unfortunate inhabitants an atmosphere perpetually impregnated with slow poisons. It is an offence to place a spring-gun in your garden, to shoot a man who has no right to be there; it is an offence to let an emigrant-ship be overcrowded, or to sell unwholesome food; why should not the law also prohibit a man from making money by the construction of dwellings in such a manner as to shorten life, and from deriving a direct revenue by the destruction of his fellow-creatures? Of the removal of such unhealthy edifices already in existence, where it may be required for the widening of streets, and opening up breathing-places for the people, the public must to a certain extent bear the cost: we cannot call on a man to pull down the house he has built in conformity with the law. It may be right, however, to impose obligations on the future builders of dwellings for the working-classes. When a public sewer passes their door, they should be compelled to lead a drain to it: they should be under definite restrictions as to packing the buildings too closely, and might be subjected to minor architectural regulations for the furtherance of ventilation, the avoidance of damp, &c.

We have made these remarks without reference to the special provisions of a Bill now before us, "For the better drainage and improvement of buildings in large towns and villages." It would be a useless task to criticise a measure which, after having gone through a multitude of alterations, and being likely to undergo still more, has been in the mean time withdrawn. Its details may be materially different when we meet it again, and in the mean time it would be useless to do more than express our hearty concurrence in the spirit in which the measure is brought forward.

RANDOM RHYMES.

LAYS OF SCOTTISH HISTORY.

THE FOREST MEETING.

It was in the twelve-hundredth year
Of Christ and seventy-four,
When Alexander ruled the land—
The third that name who bore;
In that sweet season when the North
Doth thank departing Spring,
And southern woods the Summer's voice
With song are answering;
There chanced, one pleasant April noon,
A lonely knight to ride,
Pricking his steed in listless mood,
By blooming Girvan side.
High in the lift the lark unseen
Sent down his quivering song;—
Unreckoned voices answered him,
The spring-tide boughs among.
'Twas in no warlike guise he rode,
Nor sword nor lance had he,
And there, in sooth, unfitting 'twere
A warrior's weeds to see,—
But bore his mantle broad the cross;
Nor many moons had gone,
Since on his shield, 'mid Paynim foes,
The holy symbol shone.
As through the glade he went, the sound
Of mirth came on his ear,
And fitfully his bugle-horn
Some huntsman winded clear.
He listened, and the hawkbell's chime
The breeze was sweetly bringing;
Voices and laughter musical
Were through the greenwood ringing.
A gallant train, perdie!—they come
With hawk and winded horn,
All through the forest merrily
On mettled palfreys borne.
'T is not those huntsmen's forest garb,
Their faces blithe and merry,—
Those damsels with their cheeks of bloom
And lips that mock the cherry.
He saw them, but he marked them not,
Nor could they now beguile
His eyes, and yet his eyes he fixed,
And checked his steed the while.
Beneath her woodland cap of green,
Her hair is darkly straying,

Within her gentle eyes the light
Of twenty springs is playing.
The light that dwells within her eye
And in her smile, is one,
Nor bears her brow another gem
But purity alone.
Her face,—the form her cloak revealed,
Her tapering boddice bound—
Around the warrior's eyes and heart
Their quick entrancement wound.
He bent him to his saddle-bow,
And courteous greeting made,
Then urged his steed his way to hold
Beneath the forest shade.
Outspake that dame of beauty rare—
"Why haste you thus, Sir Knight?
"Fear you that we be strong in force,
"And you in single plight?
"I pray you quit this idle dread,
"And safely ride with me;
"For welcome to my lonely towers,
"A Red-cross Knight shall be."
Again his body bent he low—
"O dame beyond compare!
"As through these flowery paths I came "That deck the valley fair,
"I looked to see the form of grace
"Who ruled the scenes around,
"And lo, the Queen of all appears,
"By her own beauty crowned!
"But pardon me, if undelayed
"My journey must be sped;
"Nor add unto the witching spell
"Already o'er me shed."
The lady and her maidens all
The captive knight surround,
And powerless is the warrior's arm
Whom gentle love hath bound.
Within her hand, so soft and small,
She seized his bridle rein,
And through the wood, with hawk and horn,
Again rode on the train.
Her merry maidens whispered then,
As trooping on went they,—
"Well may we laugh, for gallantly
"Our sport hath sped to-day!
"Why, huntsmen, are your bugles slow
"The wonted pryse to sound?
"A Red-cross Knight is worthier game
"Than e'er your beagles found."

They cleared the wood—they crossed the wold—
 Bright gleamed the waves of Clyde,
 And Turnberry's high and stalwart towers,
 Looked o'er the ocean wide.
 Within those walls, till evensong,
 A guest the knight remained,—
 And morning shone, and there was he
 In Beauty's thrall detained.
 He little recked the hours that fled,
 The days that went and came—
 He looked but in his lady's eyes,
 And they were still the same.
 Twice seven days have come and gone,
 And morning's beams are breaking,
 The distant heavings of the sea
 Are in the sunlight waking.
 Across the waves—along the shore
 The virgin light is stealing,
 The darkly-spreading castle walls,
 And shrouded towers, revealing.
 The lattice of the low chapelle
 Admits the holy beam,
 And altar high, and shadowed floor
 Are brightening in the gleam.
 Within the altar's sacred pale
 A white robed priest there stands,
 There rests a blessing on his lips,
 And on his lifted hands.
 Without the altar's sacred pale
 There kneels a youthful pair,—
 'Tis he, the love-bound Red-cross Knight,
 And she, that lady fair !
 The lady is the Countess high
 Of Carrick's hill and vale ;
 That warrior is the princely Bruce,
 The lord of Annandale.
 The wedding words were spoken there,
 Unknown to kith or kin ;
 And shall it please the Scottish king
 To dare his ward to win ?
 But little cause her kindred found
 The wooing Bruce to spurn,
 And from his ire the Scottish King
 Well-reckoned gold did turn.*
 O Marjory, fair Marjory,
 How joyed thy soul to see
 Thy bright-eyed first-born sit and smile
 Upon his nurse's knee !
 But could not even thy searching eye
 His future path reveal,
 When Bruce in all his manhood rose
 To work his country's weal.
 The perils and the toils he bore
 Had turned thy joy to woe ;
 The deathless glory that he won
 Again had roused its glow.
 Then blessed—blessed evermore
 The forest meeting be,
 That gave a Bruce to Bannockburn
 And kept our country free !

THE OLD MAN'S MELODIES.

O THE blossoms of youth, and the blighting of years !
 How dreary the garden of promise appears !
 How vainly I look, when with age clouded o'er,
 For the smiles and the voices that met me before !

But lives in my bosom the feeling, as young,
 That then to the flowing of melody sprung,
 When youth's careless bounding was saddened away
 By the Flowers of the Forest, and Auld Robin Gray.

I have heard them at home, by the hearth and the hill,
 When night winds were dreary, or evening was still ;
 I have heard them afar on the deep's mighty breast,
 And their melody moaning in woods of the West.

* Marjory countess of Carrick being the legal ward of Alexander III., and having married without his consent, a certain sum of penalty fell to be paid to the king.

In a land where the music of mine is unknown,
 'T is there I'm a stranger, and there I'm alone ;
 But there's home in a tune, if the tune that they play
 Be the Flowers of the Forest, or Auld Robin Gray.

There is trumping in war—there is piping in peace—
 There is music for mirth, and for sorrow's increase—
 There's a song for the young, merry-hearted, and bold,
 And, blest be its music !—a tune for the old.

And in age I have friends that will listen with me,
 Nor boast from the power of sweet sounds to be free,
 But sadly be solaced, at life's closing day,
 By the Flowers of the Forest, and Auld Robin Gray.

THE EXILE.

HE has lain him down, amid burning tears,
 On a couch that was never pressed,
 On the hoary moss of a thousand years,
 In the depths of the pathless West.
 And the starlight, through the dusky sky,
 Paling the foliage, shines ;
 While the moan of the breeze comes mournfully
 Over the giant pines !

O where is the mother who clasped his hand,
 When his eyes with sleep were dim !
 Where is the sunny sister-band
 That once wove smiles for him ?
 Where is the father who bade him rejoice
 In the God he loved so well !
 And the silver laugh of that worshipped voice
 That bound him with passion's spell !
 Why breathe they not o'er the lonely one,
 To moisten his parched brow !
 Alas ! from their visions life has flown,
 And they cannot weep o'er him now !
 They have pillowed the calm of their last low bed,
 In the happy clime of their birth ;
 And he, the loved one, must lay his head
 On stranger and unknown earth !

Ah, little did his fond mother know,
 As she taught him a hisping prayer,
 And her features were lit with that smiling glow
 Which a mother's alone can wear :
 And little did his father dream,
 As he fondled him on his knee,
 That near the waves of an Indian stream
 Would perish that bright boy's glee !

His sunny sisters would know him not,
 The friend of their childhood's hours,
 Their brother, resting on that dark spot,
 Amidst the alien flowers :
 And the one he loved in a former day,
 Alas ! could she know him again !
 But his weary spirit is passing away,
 And to utter her name were vain.

THE OLD VILLAGE COMMON.

THE Old Village Common is under the plough,
 But not of the poor, and it grieves me enow ;
 For no more do their children, all rosy and gay,
 Upon its close greensward roll over and play ;
 No more their ass crops up the sweet thistle blow,
 And no more it is graced by their strawberry cow.

The Old Village Common ! its verdure has fled
 Like the hopes of the poor unto whom it was wed.
 With the marriage of neighbourhood, love, and the play
 Of the feelings of childhood which fade not away ;
 But now our old common is under the plough,
 And its furrows are deep as the care on my brow.

Oh, sorrow to England ! by one and by one,
 Like the dew-drops of morn, her Old Customs have gone
 In their fairness away, and no more the poor man
 Has a flitch in his eupboard, a draught in his can.
 Bad laws and the Bread-tax black clouds round him throw ;
 And the Old Village Common is under the plough.

Oh, sorrow to England ! our Lords flee away,
 Their vows to the Devil at Paris to pay ;
 But the bold English peasant, on Sabbath, no more
 May walk in the park, for the path closed o'er ;
 And his wife and his children must tramp the road now,
 For the Old Village Common is under the plough.

THE TOASTS OF THE TRIO.

We're met ! perhaps the only three,
 In this fair city's round,
 Within whose souls the harmony
 Of feeling can be found.
 Then fill, and let us toast the joy
 Our memory holds most bright ;
 And, first, to woman kind, if coy,
 We'll quaff with fond delight.
 Hurrah ! hurrah ! hurrah ! hurrah !
 Hurrah ! hurrah !—to Woman !

We're met ! perhaps no other three
 In B—— this night are met
 Who can, with truth, be said to be
 A liege but patriot set !
 Then take the glass in hand, my boys,
 And give true feeling birth ;
 Here's to our native land, my boys,
 The choicest on the earth !
 Hurrah ! hurrah ! hurrah ! hurrah !
 Hurrah !—our Native Land !

We're met ! within the ocean sea
 Whose waves our island bind,
 No spirits now are met more free
 In hand, and heart, and mind !
 Then fill again, and rise, my boys,
 Our last toast let it be—
 To all the good and wise, my boys,
 In heart and conscience free.
 Hurrah ! hurrah ! hurrah ! hurrah !
 Hurrah ! for Liberty !

A FRAGMENT.

She turned
 And cast a tearful eye upon my path—
 I saw it, and lived on !—but that fair spot
 —The grassy valley, where we oft had dreamed
 The blissful eventide away, ling'ring
 And ling'ring, till the silent stars came out
 In startling myriads, and sent us home—
 I passed forgetfully ; I saw it not.
 The sylvan nook, where we so loved to sit
 And bare our hearts, watching the pebbly brook
 That kissed our mossy couch, and flung its dews
 On the sweet flow'ret we had planted there ;
 The ancient elm, that oft, in summer-time,
 Lent us its shade, and foiled the burning day ;
 —That elm we called the Tree of Happiness,
 Whose faithful bark tenacious held thy name—
 These, all, escaped me : for my mind was stunned
 With sorrow, and my eyes remembered not Their office.

Years have widened the domain
 Of memory, and fairer, richer scenes—
 Richer in natural loveliness than those—
 Visions more graceful than the ancient elm,
 Or aught the grassy valley has to show,
 Repicture themselves oft ; but never dim
 The recollections of my boyhood's home
 The charms of early love's locality,
 Which still are bright and sunny with his beams,
 And cannot be forgotten.

Years, long years
 "That bring the philosophic mind," have dried
 My well of grief, and left tranquillity ;
 But ne'er filled up the deep chasm of the heart, Wherein I look—to shudder. What I was
 I never can be more. With scarce a hope
 For future pleasure, (as the church-yard turf
 Ere long must grow above my bones, and shut
 Me from the world,) I live not for a boon
 The coming time may give without a claim ;—
 Joy is the child of memory with me ;
 My future is the past !—the past far back ! W. H.

VIOLET HAMILTON ; OR, THE TALENTED FAMILY.

(Concluded from our October No.)

CHAPTER XXVI.

THE servant maid had attempted to show Lord St. Edward into the small parlour which Violet, in honour of Swift, named her shuttery ; but he could not remain there, and she found him looking deadly pale, and haggard, leaning against the stair-rail. He covered his face with his hands for a moment ; but at the soft, tremulous sound of Violet's fluttering voice, while she whispered—"Lord St. Edward here !—how is Emmeline ?" the distressed young man threw himself, sobbing, upon her neck, as if she had been his sister, the friend of childhood, and of long years ; while, with difficulty, he articulated, "My Emmeline—my wife—my beloved :—she is dying—they have murdered her !—and she longs for you—she prays for—For pity's sake, madam, come to her—come with me !" Violet trembled excessively, and became as pale as the speaker, whose hand she wrung, while she said, "Dear Lord St. Edward, be composed ; tell me all ; surely I will go with you—to poor Emmeline."

She looked hurriedly round. The whole household were now in the hall ; and the quick-witted and sympathetic housemaid, unbidden, flew off for her young mistress's shawl and bonnet.

"Lord St. Edward, endeavour to command yourself, and to inform Mrs. Charles Herbert of the real state of matters.—I am certain she will do for your lady whatever is best," said Gryphon, who had known the young nobleman from his childhood.

"O, Mr. Gryphon, my wife,—my poor Emmeline, she is dying—expiring, and in torture !—When shall I be home ? Come madam,—in mercy, come, she prays for your coming."

"Who, my lord, has injured your lady ? try to tell us. Perhaps help may be got,—if you can only say what is wrong," persisted Gryphon.

"Her brother has done it all. He, wretch,—presumptuous, ignorant wretch,—he has killed her,—and by such agony !—her beautiful face so distorted. O God, my God, have mercy !"

Violet's eyes were streaming, and she now grasped St. Edward's arm as if to drag him on, while the housemaid put on her shawl.

Mr. Gryphon and Herbert whispered together for a moment, while Mrs. Herbert, fondly embracing her daughter-in-law, whispered, "Dear love, but take care of yourself," and helped her to get ready. It was hastily agreed that Mr. Gryphon should accompany Mrs. Charles and Lord St. Edward; and that Herbert would follow in an hour or two to fetch back his wife.

On the short drive they learned that the Countess had been for several days complaining of some slight ailment incidental to her condition, and that her brother had that afternoon ordered her a composing draught, the prescription for which he had written out himself. Her own servant—her "groom of the chambers"—had gone to have it made up at the shop of a respectable apothecary, and it had been administered by Mrs. Jenkins, the lady's-maid. In a very short time after taking the medicine, Lady St. Edward had been seized with spasms, which at last became so violent that her alarmed maid went and told Lord St. Edward; and a surgeon of eminence in the neighbourhood was immediately sent for, who on seeing her, rashly and harshly declared that she had been poisoned by a quack, and had not many hours to live,—that no skill could save her!

The frantic St. Edward flew himself to the family physician of his grandfather, in whom he had the utmost confidence, from having been attended by him in every real or grandmamma-imagined malady from infancy. He was so fortunate as to find Dr. Blande just before he made his evening round of visits; and, on his suggestion, taking up an eminent physician-accoucheur on their way, not a moment was lost in hastening to the hôtel. And all was done that the greatest skill and tenderness could accomplish to relieve the bodily agonies of the really interesting young victim of ignorant pretension.

While in the intervals of torture, the poor girl clung convulsively to her distracted husband, she also cried piteously for "Gabrielle—for Violette—for her kind, her only friend;" and probably to spare St. Edward the sight of her extreme suffering, the physician humanely devised the expedient of despatching him to fetch this loved friend. This done, and leaving the young Countess in the care of the other medical men, he thought it his duty to go to Plantagenet House to apprise his noble patrons there, of the expected catastrophe, and to draw their attention to the condition of St. Edward. Little delicacy of preparation was needed in announcing an event which, however shocking to humanity at the moment, could not be regarded as a serious calamity, though it could hardly yet be talked of as a deliverance. The Duke was annoyed and fidgety. He had yesterday resented the promise of an heir; but now he somehow felt himself personally wronged, and resented this promise being blighted; there was again but that one "puny boy" between him and the dreadful misfortune of the family honours going out of the direct male line. A draught was ordered for his Grace of Plantagenet, with an immediate foot-bath, and retreat to bed; and all for the simple circumstance of the threatened death of a musician's daughter.

The Duchess and her confidential maid were equally excited; but their fears were chiefly for St. Edward; though her Grace having of late taken to what she fancied religion, could not but remark to her gentlewoman the visible hand of Providence in thus removing the presumptuous plebeian intruder into her princely house. She also felt some little curiosity to behold, before it had vanished for ever—been hidden in the grave—that fatal beauty which had bewitched her grandson:—Besides, it would look magnanimous, noble, Christian, to visit, and, on her death-bed, pardon the crime of the Cinderella Countess against the House of Plantagenet. Her Grace was of a forgiving disposition.

The Duchess of Plantagenet felt as if in a dream when she found herself in a crowded bed-chamber, and saw her grandson—Lord St. Edward—the representative of all the Plantagenets, and of the accumulated honours of five centuries, kneeling by the bed-side of a low-born girl, the daughter of a fiddler, covering her hands with tears and kisses, and passionately addressing her as his beloved—his idolized wife—his darling Emmeline!—conjuring her to live—and frantically vowing to die with her! regardless, and apparently unconscious, of the noble grandmother's presence, who had thus graciously condescended—who had acted so noble and Christian a part.

A very lovely young woman, seated in the bed, tenderly supported the alternately convulsed and sinking frame of the poor sufferer on her bosom and in her arms, and wiped away the sweat of agony which rolled down her fair brow. The Duchess was human. Vexed and annoyed, as she was, by the extravagant, and, as she thought, preposterous grief of her grandson, she could not, wholly unmoved, look upon the sufferings which so strongly affected him, and think how soon they were to terminate in death.

But there were so many strange faces around—low people all. The emotions of this noble lady were curiously complicated. That young woman who sat in the bed,—she seemed a very gentle and lovely person as she shifted her pliant form from side to side, the more tenderly to support the dying girl; but she was no doubt a Cryppes—probably a sister;—and, so strong is prejudice, that her Grace drew back from the bed-side with loathing. Her matronly maid, probably divining her thoughts, whispered, "That young lady, your Grace, is Mrs. Charles Herbert."

The Duchess was instantly relieved of her disgust, and even touched with sympathy. She softly approached the bed-side, and gently touched the kneeling St. Edward's shoulder, while her maid whispered, "The Duchess, my lord:" St. Edward started up, and fervently wrung her hand in silence. The dying girl also heard the whisper, and raised her large lustrous eyes to the face of the noble lady, with an expression never to be forgotten. Altogether there was something in the scene which took the feelings of the Duchess by storm.

"St. Edward, my dear boy, do be more composed," she said in an affectionate tone; "my physician is a man of the greatest skill,—she may do well yet."

"My wife—my Emmeline!" again burst from the unconscious lips of the poor youth; "Emmeline, my angel, for what do you look? for what do you sigh? I cannot bear those looks. I am with you, love: I will not leave you. Death shall not part us! . . . Grandmother, she beckons for you. My own angel, the Duchess will do whatever you desire. Will you not, grandmother?" and he impetuously drew forward the stately old lady, who was now shuddering with emotion. The poor girl clasped and tried to raise her imploring hands; while, in under-breathed tones, and in a voice which Violet long remembered as the most pathetic in which human speech had ever been articulated, she whispered,—“O, madam, pardon St. Edward! If it was wrong to love me, I shall not be long in your way.”

She was now tremulously drawing off her marriage ring—which she slipped on the finger of St. Edward, kissing his hand again and again, and clasping it to her bosom—and then she sunk back on the bosom of Violet, tears now stealing calmly from under her closed eye-lashes. St. Edward burst out of the room, unable to suppress his frantic grief, nor daring to break in upon the hallowed tranquillity in which his dying wife seemed at that moment to repose.

But the dreadful spasm soon returned—she fetched her breath hard, gasped, and became convulsed for an instant. The Duchess was now much affected. With Violet, to whom she had not spoken, she exchanged an earnest sympathizing look—and as the patient became easier, she kindly took her hand, while she said—“Compose yourself, my child—you may soon, I hope, be better.”

Emmeline smiled in ghastly sort, and shook her head.

“How condescending of her Grace!—what an angel of a lady is your lady the Duchess!” came to Violet’s ears, in the very audible whisper of Jenkins, to the other lady’s maid; and mournful as was the scene, she could, at the moment, almost have laughed.

The Duchess glanced disdain at the presumptuous vulgar flatterer, whom she set down for yet another Cryppes, and, turning haughtily away, went to seek her grandson; to whom she was determined, at whatever cost, to carry home with her.

Violet was now left alone with Emmeline, as Mrs. Jenkins had been attracted by a Babel of confused tongues, and other extraordinary noises ascending from below; where Mr. Gryphon, and the master of the hôtel, under the positive orders of the physician, were defending the sick-chamber against all intruders—“preventing the mother from seeing her dying child!”—an unnatural crime, which Mrs. Cryppes to her dying day repeated to the lawyer’s everlasting shame.

“Is St. Edward out of the room, dear Violette?” whispered the sufferer.

“He is, my love—but he will be back.”

“Comfort him, Violette, when I am gone. He is very good—very affectionate; no one knows how amiable he is, save myself. I have been very foolish—very wayward—wicked; but I loved him every day fonder and more fondly:—And only today—I was so happy, resolving to be good, and to make St. Edward happy, and hoping that you, dear Violette, would teach me how—and now—O my God! and I am so young too—so young!”

St. Edward now glided in, and she saw him through her tears, and held out her arms. They were for some time locked in that passionate silent embrace in which Violet feared the sinking sufferer had breathed her last.

Emmeline spoke first—“My poor father—will you, St. Edward, be kind to the poor old man for Emmeline’s sake? He will feel!—This is my last request.”—While St. Edward sobbed out the tenderest assurances of devout attention to the smallest wish of hers, her eyes flashed with a preternatural brightness,—and kissing his brow and fervently blessing him, she said, “Now I am happy; go now to the Duchess, and Mrs. Charles will send for you when I want you.—God bless you, dear St. Edward!”

“Emmeline, my angel, you are better,” exclaimed the delighted young man—“you speak so firmly now.”

“Yes, I am better—much better—perhaps I shall sleep now.” St. Edward looked earnestly to Violet, as if questioning her; but the eyes she cast down to avoid his glance, gave no encouraging response. He went away, and there was a long dead silence; and the exhausted creature actually sunk into a kind of sleep—from which she was hurriedly roused by the loud noise at her chamber door. She had dreamt, she said, of her father crying, and of her mother and Jenkins scolding; and she was smiling at her dream when the noises, which were no dream-sounds, increased. There was a plunge at the door, and a rush of people into the room, and Emmeline was seized with another violent fit. The surgeon, called in from the adjoining room where he waited, relieved Violet from her distressing position, and entreated her to go out, or she would injure herself. The sight of Emmeline’s agony—the distraction of the sounds and sights around, were indeed too much for her. She nearly fainted, and was assisted down to the drawing-room, where her alarmed husband received her.

In a very few seconds, however, she was perfectly recovered, and would have gone back;—but the surgeon, who came to her, said that it was too late. “All was over!” The young Countess had expired in that last fit—“into which,” he said, “she had been thrown by the irruption of those savages.” Gryphon now entered; and inquired with the greatest tenderness for Mrs. Charles Herbert—while to Charles he whispered, “What a dear, angelic creature is your wife! That detestable charlatan, Edmund Cryppes—is he to escape the hanging he so richly deserves?—he blames the apothecary—he blames the maid, who gave, he says, four doses to her mistress in one. But I blame him only; and if I were on the inquest, I know his fate—”

“His ignorance and presumption are likely to bring their own punishment,” said Herbert—“not only to himself, but to others of the family.”

“Ay, that it will,” returned Gryphon, in an exulting tone. He never pretended to be of a forgiving disposition. “Well, my fine scheme is all up now; you must have had the second sight, Mr Herbert," said Gryphon in a tone of chagrin; and he stalked about the room, where Herbert and his wife only waited till her shoes, which she had thrown off when supporting Emmeline, and her bonnet could be procured. Mrs. Jenkins now entered, not with the required articles, which she was too much excited to attend to, but with a theatrical curtsy, to announce to Mr. Gryphon, that her Grace the Duchess desired to see him in the other drawing-room immediately.

"Can you find Mrs. Herbert's things, Jenkins?" said Herbert familiarly; but the waiting-maid of a Countess distanced him.

"Your servant, Mrs. Charles Herbert. Her Grace the Duchess hopes you are recovered, ma'am. I hope Mrs. Herbert, senior, is well? I have been proposing to call for her all the season, but your present quarter is so out of the world——"

Violet, who could be rude to no one, although she had wished to be so, was certainly not sensible of Jenkins' condescension, for she made no sort of reply. To her husband she said, as if unconscious of the waiting-woman's presence—"Poor Emmy, Charles; but she is past our regrets. Poor Lord St. Edward! I shall love him always: he has a warm and a very tender heart. You must try to-night not to let the Cryppeses annoy him. Are they still above?"

"Yes, the vulgar low-bred creatures," replied Jenkins; "though both my lord and her Grace . . . Coming, ma'am!—" And Jenkins ran to the other waiting-woman, who, she fancied, summoned her, and Herbert went out to see if he could do anything for the distracted young widower, or, curious concatenation! find his wife's shoes. He soon returned—"St. Edward is gone, all the rest are above; and such a scene! Poor old Cryppes! But the harpy mother! Mrs. Barker assumes the decent garb of hypocrisy, if she does not feel."

"What strangely mingled beings we are," said Violet; "such a strange mixture of tenderness, selfishness, avarice, haughty pride, angry passions, and all bursting forth in the very presence of Death, with more violence from the attempt to suppress their expression. I can never forget the scene amid which this poor girl expired—her fluttering soul chased by their loud fierce wrath."

Mr. Gryphon came back evidently much excited, and attended by a waiter, carrying a lighted taper, tape, and several sticks of wax.

"I thought my duty was ended, when I kept those people off till the breath was about out of the poor girl's body; but now I have to guard against their pillaging the corpse. Will you assist me to seal up Lord and Lady St. Edward's repositories and rooms, Mr. Herbert, to prevent a general skirmish and plunder being carried on by mother and maid."

"I really cannot again leave my own poor wife," said Herbert, "I have sent a waiter to buy shoes for her poor feet."

"O, true!—I am a brute to think of it: then, God bless you both. I will see you early to-morrow. The Duchess, who is a very sensible woman, when she likes, has just been talking to me of another plan, which I think well of. My respectful compliments to my fair ally. I still depend on her coöperation."

He went off in haste to use his official wax and tape; and, in a few minutes afterwards, Mrs. Cryppes, Mrs. Barker, and Mademoiselle Jenkins, entered in train; probably in right of the room having been that of Lord and Lady St. Edward, each holding a handkerchief to her eyes. Herbert and his wife chose to wait anywhere rather than longer here,—and moved off.

"Stay, pray, one moment, Mrs. Charles Herbert," said the elder matron. "You know my feelings for the dear deceased—ever my favourite child—the flower of my lovely flock. I am certain, ma'am, that after the tenderness and hospitality with which you were treated in my family—like one of my own daughters indeed—no distinction made—that you must feel much for this sad bereavement—this first breach in a family so affectionate and united as ours;—and to think that I was too late to see my child! And my poor husband who so doted on Emmeline."

"I am truly sorry for Mr. Cryppes, indeed, ma'am," said Violet, glad to have anything to say with honesty.

"But you were witness, this worthy soul tells me, to the promise my darling exacted from Lord St. Edward to provide handsomely for her parents."

"Yes, indeed, Mrs. Charles was witness of that," said Jenkins, who had gone up stairs a violent anti-Cryppesite, and descended making common cause with Mrs. Cryppes against that "old Dragon Gryphon," who had actually turned them out of Lady St. Edward's room, locked the door, and put the key in his pocket.

"And a great deal of my undeniable personal property lying about," sobbed Jenkins, in rage. "And your lady's shawl and slippers too; as if my late lady's mother and me, her confidential young lady, were common thieves."

"What sort of law and justice is that, pray?" put in Mrs. Cryppes. "Never was such impertinence heard of: O if my son Jack were but here, let me see who would dare to insult me in this manner."

For Heaven's sake no more of this, mother," cried Mrs. Barker, really ashamed and angry. "What are such trifles to our ruin—I mean, to our irreparable loss;" and the subdued woman wept, leaning against the mantel-piece, and covering her face in a passion of seemingly real grief, which touched the hearts of the Herberts. When she was a little more composed, Mr. Herbert inquired for her husband.

"Very ill, indeed, Mr. Herbert,—so seriously ill, that but for this dreadful, this most unlooked-for stroke, I should not have left him to-night. That rash, unfortunate creature Edmund!—such brilliant prospects as were opening to my dear sister, and ultimately to all her family. Barker was so warmly attached to Emmy—she was indeed more like his own child than a sister-in-law. How will he in his present condition bear this new stroke?" Mrs. Barker wept afresh.

"Good night, Mrs. Barker," said Violet, in a little while, softly taking her hand ; " believe me I feel for you, indeed—for your father——"

" You are going, then, ma'am ?" interposed Mrs. Cryppes, and now sharply ; " I presume you can make no objection to give the evidence Jenkins refers to ?—Maria, my dear, you who are so clever a pen-woman, had you not better make a small memorandum of the thing at the moment, while it is still fresh in Mrs. Charles Herbert's mind ?"

Mrs. Charles Herbert looked embarrassed, and her husband answered for her. " However the matter may stand, the discussion is surely premature, ma'am. . . . Come, my love, since Mr. Gryphon has laid an embargo on your shawl, I shall make free with his cloak for your use."

" Pray, Mr. Charles, since you are now a lawyer, or as good, will you tell me, has Mr. Gryphon any right whatever, by either Magna Charta or Habeas Corpus, to interfere with my lady's wardrobe ? Is it not mine,—mine, sir, by the laws and usages of every genteel family in England ?—and that a Duchess should demean herself to keep paltry rings, watches, and old clothes—for my lady, not being countenanced, had no valuable jewels——"

" My daughter's wardrobe was a very complete and valuable one, and almost as good as new," said Mrs. Cryppes sharply, taking the reply on herself ; " far too valuable to be thrown to servants as cast-offs. . . . And as for watches and jewels, her own family—her mother and her sister——"

" Mrs. Cryppes knows far more of the law of such inheritances than I pretend to do, Miss Jenkins," interrupted Herbert, who had now taken his shoeless wife under his arm, determined to carry her to the coach that he had in waiting, rather than expose her to the scene which he foresaw ; and which was heralded by Mrs. Cryppes' declaration of her intention to go to Plantagenet House, and see her son-in-law that instant, and tell him a piece of her mind of matters, and of the treatment she had received from his pretty agent.

Thankful was Violet when, still shoeless and unshawled, but with her feet carefully wrapped by Herbert in Mr. Gryphon's cloak, and her head leaning on her husband's breast, she found herself on the way home. Neither of them spoke much ; their hearts were full, their thoughts busy. They were almost at their own door before Herbert, uneasy at her continued silence, inquired if she was quite well.

" Quite well—for myself only too well—too blest ;—but what an evening this has been ! We were all too gay and giddy at home this afternoon—and what a lesson !——"

" Not too gay, dear love—nor giddy at all—though so supremely happy that we may need sometimes to be reminded that we are mortal."

" And how gently the lesson comes to us," said the wife. " Those miserable people—but I am sorry for none of them save the poor old father."

" I met him on the stairs, poor old man. He did not seem to know me," said Herbert ; " he was like a man distracted."

" And Mr. Barker, too, Charles. Surely you feel a little for him. Nature intended him for something so very different from what he has made himself."

" I cannot help that, Violet ;—but there is my mother not to be deterred yet—very curious, I make no doubt ;—you, however, shall go to your room at once, and I will gratify her curiosity ; and console her for the disappointment that awaits her ; and then she will go to coddle you ; and you may tell her Gryphon is in love with her, by way of consolation for the loss of that ' charming residence.' "

Violet almost scolded her husband : she was becoming every day less a heroine, and more a wife.

Meanwhile Mrs. Barker, finding it impossible to keep down the angry altercation between the mother and the maid, left them, and returned home wretched enough. An execution had been put into the house that morning, though she and her mother had provided pretty well against such an event ; and the people in charge were perfectly civil and accommodating. Her sick husband's apartment had been kept inviolate. She was spared the pain of announcing her sister's death, and the downfall of every hope in that quarter by finding Barker quite delirious. His mind had been wandering all that morning, and now his wife's presence irritated and made him so violent, that at length it was found necessary to call the men in charge of the furniture into his room to prevent him leaping from the window to escape from the horrible demon into which delirium converted his wife.

It was with great reluctance, with heartfelt, if not wholly unselfish sorrow, that she, two days afterwards, consented that he should be placed under restraint, and saw him carried away to the same private asylum for the insane, on the banks of the Thames, to which he had, some days before, devoted the unfortunate Bigsby. Her own sufferings, and his dreadful condition, had revived all the affection of the early days of their attachment, when the bold, dashing belle had been the proud mistress of the " talented Burke Barker."

The letter which, in a few days afterwards, she wrote to Mrs. Charles Herbert, begging through the interest of the Herberts with Mr. Gryphon, that something might be done by Lord St. Edward for her father, concluded, " O Violet, do you not pity me !"

" Indeed I do pity her," said Violet to her husband ; " adversity, while it has crushed her pride, has perhaps softened her heart.—And the poor old man !—he had some accident, she mentions, a few days ago : they fear injury to the brain. The mother she does not mention."

It is impossible to tell whether the injury received in his fall, the burning of his opera, or the shock of the sudden loss of his daughter, and the overthrow of all his towering hopes, had produced the fatal effect. But when Mrs. Cryppes went to her lodgings after all but pulling caps with Jenkins for those spoils, still safe under Gryphon's seals, she found her husband home before her, and in a frenzy fit, covering the walls of the room with gigantic musical notes, which he boldly scratched on with burned corks, all the while chanting what he called The Requiem.

"As I vow, he has spoiled the whole of that nice, new silver paper!" cried the horrified lady of the Professor, on entering the drawing-room. "Cryppes, are you out of your mind?—how are you to pay for new-hanging the room?—And we must have genteel mourning, too, come from where it will, for my daughter the Countess."

Of the Professor we can tell no more, until a few mornings afterwards, when Mrs. Marion met him in Piccadilly, wearing a kind of fantastic shabby mourning, with plenty of streaming rusty crape. He told her, with his usual pomp of manner, that he was going to see the escutcheon properly hung on Plantagenet House, before he attended the remains of his daughter, the Countess of St. Edward, to the family vault in Staffordshire, and had the Requiem performed; and he most politely took off his hat, and, bowing low, wished her a good morning, as he hurried off on this mad business.

"Puir, puffed-up, conceited creature!—scantly honest, too, as he and as every extravagant, needy man must often be, my heart was wae for him!" Marion said, while telling Violet the circumstance.—"No doubt the Duke's flunkies would turn him from the door."

"He must be cared for, my poor master," replied Violet. "Lord St. Edward won't forget poor Emmy's last request."

The young man forgot none of her requests, and none of those whom she had loved. Herbert and his wife were the first persons he saw, and this by his own desire; and the first time that he came abroad was to sit for several hours, sad, melancholy, and silent, by Violet's side. These silent visits were repeated almost daily, until gradually he could freely speak to her on the subject nearest his heart—the subject on which his lips were sealed to all others.

About a fortnight after Emmeline's death Mr. Gryphon one morning came to Chelsea with Herbert, having directed old Marion to meet him there on business which required her presence.

"I am come, ladies," he said; "with a new project which I did not choose to tell Mr. Charles, save in the presence of my fair ally, though I do not anticipate his refusal this time. It has nothing to do with pecuniary matters. I have myself the honour of being the Duke's Chamberlain, as I will probably be that of the future Duke."

"How delightful!" exclaimed Mrs. Herbert; "I congratulate you most heartily;—your position I conceive more enviable than that of the Duke himself—that charming place."

"Far too good for a lonely bachelor." Gryphon did not this time say an old bachelor.

"Canna ye take a wife, then, sir?" said Marion, laughingly.

"But who will have me? there's the misery, Mrs. Linton."

"Howt awa! ye may try surely;—there ne'er was a silly Jocky but there was as silly a Jenny."

"Very complimentary, indeed: but if the silly Jocky were vain enough to aspire to a clever and handsome Jenny, what does Scotch wisdom say then?"

"Why, ye can still but try, sir:—bode a gown of gold, and ye'll aye get a sleeve. 'Faint Heart never won Fair Lady.' Try ye:—After all I have seen in my day, I would not answer for what ony woman will do in the marrying line, till she's fairly speered. I would no answer for my very sel', for as auld as I am, if Jack Cryppes but fairly asked me, and held at me——"

"Rare candour—admirable advice," cried Herbert; "don't you think so, Mr. Gryphon?"

Gryphon smiled rather foolishly: "The business, Mr. Gryphon?" said Mrs. Herbert, somewhat impatiently; "I own I am curious to learn what Charles will not refuse and I approve of—he was so ungracious last time."

"He will not refuse to accompany Lord St. Edward in a leisurely tour on the Continent, and a residence at Nice of a few months? or, if that don't suit, merely accompany him, and leave him where the family oracle, Dr. Blande, fancies he will best spend the winter. The Duke makes this a special request—and poor St. Edward——"

"But my own poor wife, Mr. Gryphon: save for Violet it would give me the utmost pleasure to accompany St. Edward, whom I really like,—as well as I can like any young lord——"

"But can't you take your wife with you, my good sir? Heaven forbid that I should part man and wife, at least when they wish to remain together."

"That is charming," cried Mrs. Herbert, "and my friend Lady Laura Temple,—your own cousin, Violet,—is now at Nice. You will all be so much the better of the trip; made too with all the appliances and means of wealthy English aristocracy; that makes a vast difference in travelling."

Violet did look delighted for a moment,—and the eyes of the married lovers met, consulted, and congratulated, all in one instant of time.

"But you," she said, recalled at once, "you, Maman, how could we leave you alone for so long?"

"Never mind me,—I shall enjoy the journey quite as much through your letters as if I were to make it myself."

"We'll take the greatest care of Mrs. Herbert," said Marion jocosely, "till ye come back; will we not, Mr. Gryphon?" And Mr. Gryphon made as gallant a reply, as his fear of offending the delicacy of the refined widow permitted.

Violet, after the happy arrangement had been concluded, expressed some surprise to her husband that Mr. Gryphon had not included Mrs. Herbert,— "It must be all the same to the Plantagenets."

"He perhaps wishes to keep her at home to have her all to himself to court, while we are away."

"Fie, Charles! do you imagine that your mother would accept of Mr. Gryphon—or marry any man indeed?"

"Upon my soul I do, Violet,—and no disparagement to the sex in general, nor to my mother in particular. She will marry a worthy, good-natured, wealthy man,—to whom she will be every—" thing, and exceedingly happy, I make no doubt,—with at least £2000 a year. And now when he comes a-wooing, as the Duke's chamberlain, to this small house,—backed by that carriage and 'splendid place,' of which she spoke so often while ambitious of it for me,—a ducal residence it lately was,—and all those gardens and conservatories——"

"O fie, Charles, I'll never believe it."

"Till you see it, my little wife."

It was not, however, at last, for that "splendid residence," the carriage, the conservatories, &c., &c., that Mrs. Herbert did marry. O no! but from many combined, and all of them very good motives.

First, during the absence of her friends, Mr. Gryphon came very often with intelligence of them, or else to get her packets to forward; and, secondly, she discovered that besides being an able man of business, who had been of the greatest use in recovering Violet's fortune,—though it was hardly yet recovered,—he was a generous, and really in essentials, though a little brusque, a gentlemanly man. And it would be so delightful to be able to receive Herbert, Violet, and their children, for months every summer, at that charming place,—and Mr. Gryphon was so much attached to them all;—so much in love too,—but that was too ridiculous at her age.

The reasons, or rather assumptions, placed in the front rank in that awful and elaborate epistle, in which the lady's intention to take the matter into consideration was confidentially communicated to Violet, with strict injunctions not to breathe one word of it to her husband,—were, that she was now convinced the alliance would really increase Mr. Gryphon's happiness almost as much as he anticipated; and that the connexion would be of advantage to those that were and ever would be dearest to her. "One could not be so selfish as to live only for one's self."

We are sorry to be obliged to confess of our heroine, just when about to take a final leave of her, that she acted upon this occasion very like an ordinary woman, and at once showed the delicate and doubting epistle to her husband; though she certainly sharply reproved his saucy remarks and good-natured laughter on the occasion.

In the postscript to a business letter which Herbert had occasion to write to Mr. Gryphon that night, he said, "Persevere, old boy, and the day is your own."

But this was, after all, but a marriage of convenience, though one of the most auspicious of the sort; and the next attachment that fell under Violet's immediate notice surprised her much more,—and it was also much more provoking to be laughed at on this occasion; for the heroine was Laura Temple—the dignified, the grave, the high-souled Laura—who had once been all but attached—who indeed had been deeply attached to her own Charles, yet accepted the suit of young Lord St. Edward! The parties had been thrown together a great deal at Nice, while the grief of the youthful widower was still vivid and green; and Lady Laura, herself out of health and spirits, had pitied "the poor boy," her cousin Ned; whom, some fifteen years before, she, a newly-fledged Almack's beauty, had romped with, and danced upon her knee. Violet was also at times disposed to resent the transient nature of those feelings which left St. Edward, whose widowed sorrows had so shortly before deeply taxed her sympathies, free to imbibe, in a few months, a new and violent passion for a woman ten years older than himself. But that Laura Temple, having loved Charles Herbert, should love this weak and fickle, if very amiable and handsome lad, enough to marry him!—It was quite inexplicable, and somewhat teasing. Mrs. Herbert, however, was enchanted with the prospect of her friend's match. It wanted but this, but Laura as the future Duchess, to make her own subordinate rank of the Chamberlain's lady perfectly unexceptionable. Such a friend, such a neighbour! The delight of the noble grandparents of the lover was, if possible, greater than hers. This was just the match they would most have desired for St. Edward. With his unstable character, in present circumstances, Laura Temple was the very wife for him. What were a few years of seniority in comparison of her many advantages,—and what was want of fortune to them!

Herbert had laughed so often at his wife's astonishment that "such things could be" where young, true, passionate love had once been, that she at length began to laugh herself, and to say with Marion, that nothing that woman could do in the line matrimonial should ever again surprise her. She had not been many days returned from Nice with her husband, and an important small personage, whom Marion called the was French Moushie, Laura and St. Edward's godson, when Mr. and Mrs. Gryphon, who had avoided considerable awkwardness by having the knot tied a month before the Herberts returned, set out for the same quarter, commissioned to bring over the Lady Laura as the bride of the happy St. Edward. Laura was met, as a mark of high consideration, by the Duke, one stage on the Dover road, and by the Duchess on the top of the stairs; introduced that night to many noble relatives and allies; and married, by special license, very privately at Plantagenet House, by the Bishop of London, next morning. Immediately after the ceremony they set off for one of the Duke's seats, Lady St. Edward enriched with more jewels, and with a more magnificent trousseau than any younger bride of the last three seasons.

Mrs. Gryphon immediately after the marriage drove to the old little house—it looked less now every time she saw it—to tell Violet all about the wedding, and to kiss the baby, which she indeed did every day a thousand times over. "Laura sends you her dear love, Violet, and this ring with her hair. She will not make you a common person by mere marriage cards, though I suppose when they return to town the Duchess means to honour you among the select few."

"Ah, poor, pretty, wild Emmy Cryppes!" sighed Violet, "what has he made of her ring?" The new Mrs. Gryphon could not tell—did not much care. She continued, . . . "But my husband will tell you more when he comes. He is to receive the people of business to-day about the transference of" your fortune. There no longer need exist any delicacy on any one's part in assisting you to get your own, which, situated as Lady Laura lately was, might have been painful. This is another beauty in this delightful marriage. . . . Your mamma is an heiress, baby. Yea, she is! You crow at that, you rogue, you."

"Then now, dear, kind old Marion can be repaid for all her friendly, her most generous advances, in carrying on the law-suit," said Violet.

"Surely, if it does not vex the good soul to see you out of her debt. She has been of the greatest use to me in getting Mr. Gryphon's house into high order for you. I flatter myself you will be pleased with what we have done,—the good man, you know, new furnished it all for me. You will have ample accommodation for us when we visit town; and if Charles or you were to think of any country residence, while that large and splendid place can hold all the unborn generations of our grandchildren, I should never forgive you; and my husband would be worse angered, if you did not make ours your country-house. By the new railroad we will be brought within four hours of you—just a morning airing."

"Little chance of our scruples," said Violet, smiling, and rather amused at the frequency with which the late delicate and fastidious widow now cited "my husband," considering what had been her former feelings for the shrewd, gruff lawyer; but still more diverted at him presuming familiarly to call his lady Cecilia, and sometimes Cis.

"As this will be your last dinner in the dear, old, little place, which I shall love for ever, and envy everybody that lives in it, I have taken the liberty to ask Marion to come to tea. Mr. Gryphon knows that she is one of ourselves."

"Most happy will my husband be to meet the worthy, kind old lady; and I hope to prevail with her to visit us when you come down. She can fetch her pussey in a basket."

Mr. Gryphon, though both fond and proud of his wife, was not, on this day, in such violent haste to leave the dining-room as we have seen him, a year back. He had to talk with Charles about how his wife's fortune was to be invested, and about his own professional prospects. The interest and influence of the Plantagenet family were at Herbert's pleasure in any line of ambition to which his inclination led; and Gryphon recapitulated the arrangement already made by their wives about the mutual visits—the common homes.

Herbert, though apt to be impatient at the "Plantagenet family," was charmed with the addition to his own family connexion of the hearty lawyer.

While they thus talked below, the ladies above were not tongue-tied. Mrs. Gryphon, who loved the theme, expatiated to Marion upon the grand wedding of the morning.

"The weddin's are going round the year," said Marion. "I must be looking out myself. There's the Widow Cryppes off the other week."

"Mrs. Cryppes married! who is the unfortunate man?" cried Violet.

"She is now Mrs. Michael Twig, of the Lunar Rainbow Tavern——"

"Mike Twig, the Professor's old servant!" interrupted Violet, in utter amazement.

"The very same; though latterly, as ye may remember, Michael Twigg, Esq., Actuary of the Crown and Mitre Philanthropic Life Assurance Society, and the only one of the Cryppes' connexion, I believe, who has made, in the long-run, a dawbee by it, though he did pay a good 'prentice fee to Mrs. Barker for teaching him to sign his name. Mike was become a prize; and the widow had tried many trades before she condescended. First, she set up a genteel boarding-house with her daughter, for gentlewomen, at the West End. That would not do, though Sir George Lees pushed the establishment: then tried a toy-shop and library at Brighton; next, got into the Fleet. The daughter, Mrs. Barker, is fit to crucify her; but the wife's widow has pleased herself. Jenny Jenkins—I ne'er could thole her either—and she, were at the pulling of caps for Mike; but the duds that she got from Mr. Gryphon, after a',—those that belanged to her lady daughter, and that fifty pound a-year the Lord has settled on her, if she keep herself quiet, bought a young gudemane for the widow; and the lass may go whistle for a joe, like myself."

Violet was shocked at this intelligence—not pleased at her husband's levity, in being able to laugh at such a marriage when he was told of it.

"And poor Jack?" for I have quite lost sight of him," inquired Herbert.

"Na, as this is the year of the queer marriages, which comes round as surely as leap-year, when the lasses may court the men, I am no sure but Jack may put forth his parable to myself ere lang. He whiles, while you were abroad, did me the honour to borrow half-a-crown from me, more or less—for he has a speerit aboon begging. He got a bad rheumatism, puir chield, in that Dutch Bridewell, or it's as like from his scanty cleeiding—an' if ye give him a warm dud the day, it's sure to be pawned ere the morn."

"I fear poor Jack's best days are over," said Herbert.

"Indeed he's sair reduced—even Mrs. Snipson has cut him—a bad sign of his finances. . . . I have gotten 'sponsible tenants in that queen's place. A decent, weel-doin' tailor lad, frae my ain parish, wha gets a' the country news, and an auld Kelso Chronicle—it's a great treat to me. . . . But Jack, poor chield! I have aye had a regard for him since he took refuge in my meat-safe—The grand newspapers would have no more to do with him: he reported so many dreadful accidents and bloody murders that had never happened, when he needed a few shillings at an odd time,—clever lies they were too!—But once he got up a railroad collision with tremendous loss of life and limb; and as there are enow of them without Jack's help, there was the deil to pay with the proprietors. After that he did wonderful weel for a few weeks in the comic-song line about the sma' theatres, till he got as hoarse and roupy as an auld crow, with hard living, poor ne'er-do-weel! and 'sleepin' out on bulk-heads and such like, which knocked up his trade as a vocalist."

"Is not this horrible," exclaimed Herbert, "of a fellow possessed of the acquirements of Cryppes?"

"What shall ye say, Mr. Charles: what is all the tawlent and genius under the canopy of Heaven, without a kennin' of mother-wit and good steady conduct? 'The stalk o' carle hemp in man,' as our Burns well names the grand something of manhood, was aye wanting among the Cryppeses."

"Where is poor Jack now? I am rather surprised that I have not heard from him of late."

"Ye'll no need to lang for that Sir, if ance he kens ye are come back to town. I am whiles obliged to do the next thing to downright leeing to keep him aff ye;—a waffie like yon, disgracing a decent door, is more noticeable out hereabouts in the suburbs than in Fleet Street. After Jack lost the newspapers, both great and sma', and cracked his voice, he found another occupation for a time. Being in high favour with his leddy-mother, because he countenanced her in her mad-like marriage, while Mrs. Barker was fit to flay her alive—I believe he did it too, the wild scamp, mainly for the spree and fun o' the weddin';—weel, to cut my tale short, when Twig got his leddy's fortin, he opened a groat billiard-table in connexion with the public-house, and Jack, promising to be steady, was appointed marker;—but Mike said he took too much liberty with the gentlemen: and in a row the other night between man and wife, where Mrs. Twig's viperish tongue got her a launder or twa from her young gudeman, Jack's spunk got up, though he is no usually a warrior, and he thrashed his step-father soundly. The whole kit were carried off to the office,—and fancy the impudence o' the dog sending for me before Sir Peter to bail him forsooth! If Sir Peter had no' kent me before, for a countrywoman, and a 'sponsible and law-biding householder, I should have been downright affronted."

"Well done, Jack! then he really thrashed the fellow who struck his mother?—Something must be done for him—here is a sovereign for him," said Gryphon.

"Siller to him!—na, na, Mr. Gryphon; we maun do better than that among us."

"Lord St. Edward wout hear the name of one of the family mentioned, so annoyed has he been of late with their epistles. I, long since, gave Edmund, by his orders, the means of leaving England to quack and kill women somewhere else, and put a stop to unpleasant investigations here. The small annuity settled on old Cryppes is to be continued to the daughter, Susan, a modest and respectable person, with whom he died; but as for poor Jack, who has written innumerable penny histories of his noble sister's adventures, with brilliant outs to them, he is utterly odious to St. Edward. . . . What will you give, Charles—a-week—to pension Jack?—I volunteer five shillings, to be dealt out by Mrs. Marion at her discretion. I am sure she will not grudge the trouble. To solicit employment for him, of any sort, is quite out of the question, though he has most ingeniously suggested all manner of high posts, at home and abroad, that St. Edward, his noble brother-in-law, ought to procure for him."

"I'll give whatever Mrs. Linton pleases to mulct me in," replied Herbert,—"say a crown a-week, to begin with."

"I care no' if I birl my bawbee, and be an eighteenpence mysel'," cried Marion, generously emulous: "he is sic a diverting scamp; and comes aye back to me with as blithe a face as if he were in the receipt of a thousand a-year, and never had done an ill turn in his born days. It's the impudence o' him that tickles me; but he's no just a responsible moral agent. There's ower mony o' the sort in Lon'on."

"Is it right to encourage—does the worthless fellow deserve your kindness?" said Mrs. Gryphon; and Marion fancying the lady perhaps grudged the money, cried—"Hout away, madam! if even a' us, that's gude folk, got but our deserts, we might be poorly off, I trow: but there is ower muckle siller offered me;—I'll no' take aboon the half:—with a weekly income of 11s. 6d., and his ain industry, Jack would get rampant,—he would soon be above my hand."

Jack's pension was accordingly settled at the moderate rate of one shilling a-day. He was made easy for the remainder of the merry life that was not likely to be a long one.

To Marion his frequent calls became an event and an amusement—to scold, advise, dictate to, and finally to be often cajoled by Jack out of her own money, or of his allowance, long before it was due—to relieve his goods from pawnbrokers, to purchase for him warm flannel vests and stockings, again to be redeemed—to abuse him continually, and be really kind to him always—became with her a kind of habit, almost an indulgence. But, to return,—

The special business of this evening was, repaying Mrs. Linton her advances for Herbert and his wife in carrying on their lawsuit. Mr. Gryphon repaid her, calculating the legal interest to the last fraction, and paying not one fraction more. She was somewhat annoyed at first. It was like dis-severing her from those whom she loved so well; but as one's own honest money is seldom in the long run wholly unacceptable, Marion only remarked—"Weel, but what am I to do wi' it now when I have got it?"

"And how are we to show our warm sense of your generosity—of your trust in us?" said Herbert. "With my wife I include my mother and Mr. Gryphon. You are too rich and too independent in spirit to care for pecuniary reward. Is there anything in the world that we could have the satisfaction of doing to gratify you, or to show our sense of your kindness?"

Mrs. Marion, though usually a very composed, self-possessed person, now seemed uneasy, and fidgety. She cleared her throat, then hesitated for a little, and at last said with some effort, yet solemnly, and with passionate emphasis—"Yes, Mr. Charles, there is one thing, and a great thing, that Mr. Gryphon and you could do for me:—ye could help a wronged woman to her revenge!" She enunciated the last word with strong em-phasia, and with a peculiarly energetic expression of face.

Violet was half frightened.

"Merciful Heaven! you, Marion!—so kind a woman—so good a Christian!—Revenge!"

"Ay, hinny-bird—but I am but a woman for a' that; and slighted love is hard to bide—and revenge is sweet. I have lang thirsted for it; and now the time is come, if these gentlemen will befriend me."

Violet was at once relieved. Marion could never suppose her Charles capable of being the instrument of any wrong or revenge.

"Ye a', sira," Marion continued, "partly ken my story, though ye may weel think an auld wife's love-tale a real farce. It was nane in those days to me. Ye may ken, or that young lady does, that I came to this hudge metropolis, that has grown beneath my eyne like Jonah's gourd in a'e night—now weel on to forty years since—a blate, friendless lass; wi' a toom purse, and a proud stomach hiding a sair heart. I had been slighted, and scorned in the face of the haill country side; but I fought my ain way, wi' few to pity and nane to help me. And him I'll ne'er name, in this world at least, has not, as I can understand, been without his ain trials and sorrows, with a thrang family and a back-gaun farm. I hope grace has been given me to forgi'e—but, oh! I cannot forget!"

Marion paused for a moment; and Violet slid to her side, and pressed and held her hard hand; and in a few seconds, with a slight expression of contempt for her own weakness, she went on with her story.

"They would fain have curried favour with the rich auld wife that slighted the friendless maiden; but that is neither here nor there;—and sair as the father had wranged me, I had ance liked him weel; and his innocent bairns had done me no skaith. There is ane, I can understand—the youngest o' them—was kirsened Robin, or Robert Linton, after my ain father. It was a compliment, nae doubt; or, maybe, a stroke o' policy. He's been bred for the ministry, that lad; and we'll no say where the siller came frae: the bit twenty-pound note, or maybe twa o' them, that found their way down yonder about college time ilka year—from "A weel-wisher," or the like; till now the lad is ready for a kirk,—and a braw preacher, as I hear:—sound doctrine, and gi'es them blads o' it; and a rare gift o' utterance!—The father o' him was clever enough.—Now, if poor Marion Linton could do that for the young man that his mother, for whom she was slighted, could not compass, for all her gentle kin, would no' that be having my revenge, think ye, sirs?"

"I knew it of you," whispered Violet.

"It would indeed," said Gryphon, delighted with the old woman's sense and spirit, and somewhat amused with the dramatic cast of her narrative.

"This is true womanly revenge; and you shall have it too," continued Gryphon.

"Do but that for Marion, and merit all our thanks," said Herbert warmly.

"Nay, it is you must do it, Charles—you and your wife; and it well becomes you both. Make this your first request to the Duke; and though he has no Scotch livings in his own gift, so anxious are he and the Duchess to show their sense of your wife's kindness, and of your exceeding kindness and care of Lord St. Edward, that, I am certain, he will manage it."

In less than four months from this date, and while Marion was on a short visit with the Herberts, to "that splendid place," where Mrs. Gryphon reigned a little empress, the kirk of her native parish, having been vacant at the time when she first spoke of her revenge, was presented to her unknown protegè. Better still, "the haill Water," that is all the inhabitants of that pastoral valley in which it stood, came to understand that the living had been obtained through the interest of a very rich old lady in London, who had gone a poor servant girl from the parish sometime in the last century; and who now presented the Session with a pair of handsome silver Communion Cups, and mortified a thousand merks for the poor. It was a great event in the valley; where there may now be seen a "Lassies' Sewing-School," erected and endowed in the Kirkton by the same munificent Marion Linton; and six cottages, in a row, by the burn-side, with kailyards, and ten pounds a-year annexed to each; intended for single women, above fifty, of good character and cleanly habits—natives of the parish;—a preference to be delicately given to such spinsters as had experienced the slights of deceitful and ungrateful man.

We have now given a good account of most of our leading personages, save that one of them who, in respect of intellect and promise, was the most important of all. Of the fate of "the Talented Burke Barker" there are still the most contradictory rumours, all of which Marion learned as they arose, from her pensioner Jack, when he came for his solid Monday's breakfast, and his weekly allowance; or when he paid her a visit of ceremony, on what he facetiously called "a Collar day;" that is, a day occurring in every four or five, on which Jack, like the Knights of his order, sported a half inch of yellow, well-stiffened linen, in contrast with his still flourishing whiskers.

The most probable of Jack's reports was, that Barker had died in the lunatic asylum; as his lady now presided in that dismal abode, the wife of Dr. Beddoes Blood, to whom it belonged. Polly Cryppes, still a young, good-looking, showy woman, of those plausible or flattering manners which attract so numerous a class of mankind, had got very intimately acquainted with Doctor Blood, when making inquiries after her husband. And the Doctor drove a good trade, and kept a carriage. True, it was principally used to cir the insane patients; but it was nevertheless a carriage; and even before the marriage of Sir George Lees, with the rich widow of a Bengal indigo planter, had been publicly announced, her marriage took place.

By another account, which was also probable, Barker had escaped from confinement by climbing over the walls, and was found drowned in the Thames, near the spot where Bigsby lost his life; but as often as Mrs. Dr. Blood offended her brother Jack, by refusing him the too oft-solicited half-crown, he told her, and even maliciously circulated a tale, which is still heard in certain London circles,—namely, that Barker had escaped from the mad-house quite sane; and had gone first to Mexico, and then to Texas, where, under the name of Burke, he held high rank in the American marauding army; and was now one of the leading men of the young republic—a very great man, indeed, was General Burke. It was probably a pure jack-fiction, as Herbert humorously called Cryppes's inventions, as well as that Barker had sent for and married the Devonshire girl; a story invented for the amiable purpose of tormenting Mrs. Dr. Blood.

The day on which Jack went to announce his mother's death to that lady, so great was her satisfaction at the dissolution of "the low connexion," by which her mother, as she said, "disgraced her father's memory," that she gave Jack a half sovereign, and entreated him to try to find out if Barker were really alive—if Blood had, indeed, deceived her by his reported death, and betrayed her into bigamy.

"So Poll is meditating an elopement to Texas," thought Jack, hastening to a favourite cellar-tavern to melt the half-sovereign in his mother's dirge-feast. "Whether Barker is a Texan chief or not, he'll have nothing to say to Poll. Heartless jade, not to drop one tear for the old lady!—though mamma was a sad vixen to be sure."

Poor Mrs. Twig, maltreated by the young husband whom her intolerable tongue provoked, had died within the year, of gin and jealousy; leaving Jack her blessing, and a few silver coins which she had secreted beneath the mattress, and slid into his hand, in the last agony. In three weeks her place was supplied by Miss Jenkins, whose turn had naturally come round to play the part of mistress of the Lunar Rainbow.

Jack Cryppes, who kept spite against nobody, often visited his step-father and the new lady; and, in consideration of a plate of victuals or a glass of gin, stood voucher for all the extraordinary anecdotes of the great people with whom she had been familiar, with which the present Mrs. Twig chose to amuse her friends; rarely enjoying the good fun.

The last "Collar day," and some years after this, on which Jack called for his allowance, he was so much beyond his ordinary hour that Marion felt uneasy about the "scant-o-grace," who all the spring had had a very bad cough, and been spitting blood, but who, apparently, was as gay as ever, while there was one penny-piece in his pocket, or while any one, on the faith of his weekly seven shillings, would give him credit to the value of threepence—the price of a roll and a glass of gin.

"Mr. Cryppes, ye have frightened me this time—ye are looking worse and worse. Mr. Charles Herbert insists that ye must go down to the country to your sister Susan for a while, to recruit. Mrs. Charles has written her about you."

"Has she indeed?—Ah! she is a sweet, lovely soul.—I was in love with La belle Gabrielle myself once: admired her prodigiously, 'pon my honour. We had such charming duets: . . . what a galaxy of beauty and talent under my poor father's roof then! Mrs. Charles Herbert, Mr. Burke Barker, my sister Polly—myself, quoth the devil, and dear Emmy;"—and here poor Jack was seized with a long and violent fit of coughing.

"Now, my friend, why will ye haver away that nonsense gait;—be quiet, and take your coffee, and try to eat a bit—ye are burning with fever—ye are far from weel—I am really wae for ye, and wae to see you still so thoughtless."

"Are you indeed?—you are a kind old lady.—And Charles Herbert and his wife?—she has written Susan about me? And paid me so handsomely beforehand for copying that music for her—I will finish it some time:—you are all good:—perhaps if I had life to begin again, and such folks about me—But hang it, no!"—

Why be melancholy, boys!

Jack sung, and gaily went on,—

"Why, old lady, is Charles Herbert like a dowa-ger this morning?"

"The creatur is fey," thought Marion.

"D'ye give it up?" continued Jack. "Because he has got a black silk gown."

"Mr. Charles a serjeant-at-law!" screamed Marion;—"and he is weel worthy o' being a judge, let be a serjeant—ay, a judge wi' a double gown!" Scotch good wishes could go no farther; a double gown presuming a double salary. "But O! be sober now, and eat some breakfast will ye: ye are like the Laird o' Macfarlane's geese, wha liket their play better than their meat."

"Why is Mrs. Twig like her husband's sign?"—continued Jack in high glee—"D'ye give it up?—Because he has beat her into all the colours of the Rainbow—pounded her to immortal smash!" And the man of mirth, while heartily laughing, was seized with another violent fit of coughing; and, while gasping for breath, he pumped up from wasted lungs, more red blood.

"I cannot let the neer-do-weel out of my house this day—he might die in the streets," thought Marion.—Hard as he had worked for such a fate, poor Jack Cryppes, the last of the Family of the Talents, did not die in the streets.

THE END.

CHARLES CHESTERFIELD; OR THE ADVENTURES OF A YOUTH OF GENIUS.*

THIS is an exceedingly clever, but on the whole, a rather disagreeable book. We must not, however, complain that the probe of the surgeon is sharp to the touch, or the healing medicine of the physician bitter to the taste, if the state of the patient demand their application. Chesterfield unfolds or points to a condition of society, as respects literature in the capital, which may well fill simple provincials with surprise and dismay. There may be a good deal of exaggeration, and some very glaring caricature; but if one-tenth of these representations are from the life, then is literary young England to the full as profligate as La Jeune France is sometimes described. The story is simple as regards the leading interest—the fortunes of the Genius, who, by the way, is an inconceivable ninny; but there is a good deal of play at cross-purposes beneath; with a lover who seems to embody the author's conception of a true English gentleman, and with a heroine, who is a beautiful delineation of refined womanhood, whether as the high-minded daughter of a profligate fashionable father, or as the mistress of a fastidious lover. But the principal actors are the coterie people, and the patrons of literature, art, and Lions. For some of the sketches of these readings and literary soirées, Mrs. Trollope must have, we presume, drawn a good deal on her imagination, and no doubt some little upon her Parisian experiences. Her most rampant literary lion is Mr. Marchmont, the editor of the Regenerator, the "leading periodical of Europe." For impudence, ignorance, assumption, and knowledge of the weak sides of fair patronesses of a certain age, he is not amiss; but the principal literary lady, Mrs. Sherbourne, far surpasses him both in artist-like delicacy of handling, and, we sadly fear, in general truth of resemblance. Yet as there cannot be three Mrs. Sherbournes in all London—perhaps not two, was it worth while to degrade a whole class for the purpose of cleverly satirizing an individual? Any thing more despicable it is impossible to conceive, in the way of authorship, than this lady; the poor poet, who goes from house to house boring people to purchase his rhyming wares, by a kind of, what is called in Scotland, "gentle begging," being an honourable and delicate person in comparison with the Mrs. Sherbournes. Here is the original, very skilfully painted we make no doubt, and very odious when finished:—

Those who are familiar, personally, with the authorial world of London, must know, or have known, more than one person in many points exceedingly like Mrs. Sherbourne. She was, beyond all doubt, past her first youth, but she was in the fullest meridian of her second. A period, it may be observed, infinitely more thought of and cared for by the fair possessor, than the first, which in most cases is pretty much permitted to take care of itself, without any very active attempts to improve upon nature. Not so with the period which we venture to denominate the second; and it may be, that the consciousness felt by beauties in their second stage of bloom, of their charms being in a great degree the result of their own ingenious industry, may be one reason for the increased value they set upon them. At any rate, Mrs. Sherbourne did very dearly value all the beauty she had left, and certainly watched over it with quite as much care as any mother could do over her child. It has been before stated that she was exceedingly small; but if at any moment of her existence she might have felt a pang at passing almost unseen, when some noble Juno, or firm-stepping Diana, with their [her] graceful length of limb, drew all eyes upon them, she felt it amply atoned for, when she contemplated her own tiny foot and fairy hand.

Such was the person of Mrs. Sherbourne. To describe her mind as accurately would be more difficult. She certainly was not without talent—far from it; but it was of a flimsy, loose, and unstable quality. No one was more ready to pronounce an opinion, yet there was probably no subject under Heaven, except her own beauty, and that of all the young men of her acquaintance, on which she really had one.

This, as she talked a vast deal (except when engaged in one of those sentimental flirtations which are carried on entirely by means of by-play and a silence so remarkable as to attract everybody's attention)—as, excepting on these occasions, she was a great talker, the total want of fixed opinions, all must have involved her in many self-contradictions, had not her infinite skill in subterfuge and prevarication prevented it.

So habitual to her was the necessity of thus dipping, as it were, under the deep waters of her own uncertainty, in order to avoid being caught in the fact of exactly contradicting herself, that she never spoke with peculiar warmth and eloquence, without preparing a retreat from every word she uttered. Sometimes she broke down all matter-of-fact remarks, by an outbreak of playful childishness, in which her teeth and her dimple did her infinite service. Sometimes she melted away into generalities; and sometimes condensed herself into a well-told little anecdote, perfectly foreign to the subject. If the theme were earthly, positive, and inconveniently bearing upon facts, she darted gracefully aloft like a skylark, and twittered away in the region of metaphysics. Was it criticism, and did she chance to blunder grossly, from the accident of never having read a line of the work under discussion, she saved herself by setting off upon a sort of catch-me-who-can gallop, over verse and across prose; through history, and under common sense, till she had completely distanced the slow-paced march of truth and reason, and then turned ready to back upon her pursuers, perfectly unwearied, wholly unscathed, and quite ready to set off again.

For the success of her works, on which she almost entirely depended for her existence, she trusted to what she called the intensity of her own feelings. Nor did she trust in vain. No circulating library from the Orkneys to the Land's End, dared to confess that they had not got Mrs. Sherbourne's last work: and "The Condemned One"—"The Entranced One"—"The Corrupted One"—"The Infernal One"—"The Empyrean One"—and "The Disgusting One," and all in succession conveyed her intensity into every village of the empire, and brought in return wherewithal to "live and love, to dress and dream" (which in one of her "Occasional Poems" she had declared ought to be the whole of woman's existence) very much to her satisfaction. Whether she or her publisher got tired first, it is not necessary to inquire.

* 3 vols. cloth, with Illustrations; by Mrs. Trollope. Colburn.

The morning-dress of Mrs. Sherbourne never varied, at least as to its style. Summer and winter she was always décolletée, and summer and winter she was always enveloped, more or less, in a black cashmere shawl. She was usually placed on a sofa with a small table and writing-desk before her, and a very inviting arm-chair immediately opposite; nevertheless, Mrs. Sherbourne's morning visitors sometimes sat beside her on the sofa, and sometimes the examination of a new-born poem was permitted to be carried on over her shoulder, and sometimes by her side. But this, of course, was only among her particular friends: those less familiar being always established in the arm-chair.

That Mrs. Sherbourne, who had been seven years a widow, had made no second marriage, must in all civility be received as proof that she preferred a single life; and that she was very much the fashion among a certain set, and received without scruple by ladies of the highest respectability, must be held as equally conclusive of the perfect discretion of her conduct, notwithstanding her constant and avowed habit of receiving visits from all sorts of gentlemen, at almost all sorts of hours. But, as she was wont to observe, her professional existence depended upon her welcoming without reserve all those who could assist her in her pursuits, either by criticism or patronage—a truth too obvious to be controverted by any one. Her existence, therefore, glided on through a series of small literary labours, cheered by a series, equally unbroken, of small literary flirtations, each helping forward the other by a reciprocity of influence, by no means unskillfully managed. Whenever she particularly dreaded a writer of biting paragraphs, she managed to get introduced to him, and rarely failed, however fierce his nature, to calm the terrors of his pen, as far as herself was concerned, by that gentle tone of independent weakness, which, as long as a white hand remains to flourish a pocket-handkerchief, and expressive eyes to drop their liquid pearls upon it, can hardly fail to soften the most flinty heart. While, on the other hand, whenever she wished to produce an effect, and display herself as the centre of a circle, she understood perfectly well how to make common cause between her books and her beauty, without ever permitting the one to outshine the other.

The degrading artifices, the coquetries, the cajolery of this personage, her mental prostitution,—for we can find no softer term,—are well depicted, though terribly exaggerated—the patch of coarse rouge being needed to give effect to the heroine of the book as of the stage—but yet with a general colouring of truth. Her best scene is that in which she cleverly outwits the great lion—the editor of the Regenerator himself. It will not bear abridgment. Every word tells. At a literary soirée she had prevailed with him to visit her:—

“May I hope that you will condescend to call on me, Mr. Marchmont?” said Mrs. Sherbourne, when the party was beginning to disperse; and she said it with a look and tone of such touching gentleness, that few men could have avoided replying as he did.—“Will I? Good heaven what a question! Tell me where I may find you!”

Quite as early as it is usual for literary ladies to be ready for morning visits, Mr. Marchmont was at Mrs. Sherbourne's door. To say the truth, she had been for some time anxiously watching for his approach, an occupation for which a parlour window gives great facilities; and the moment she perceived him present himself at the door of the house, she flew to that of her parlour, and uttered, in rapid but distinct accents to the maid, as she passed to open it, “Let this gentleman in; but if anybody else calls before he goes away, say that I am out.”

The morning toilet of Mrs. Sherbourne has already been described as bien soignée, and exceedingly attractive, even on ordinary occasions, and it was certainly rather more so than usual now: indeed, to a woman à prétention,—and Mrs. Sherbourne was preëminently such in every sense of the phrase—no visit is more likely to excite a careful preparation than that of the editor of a critical journal, himself still received by way of a young man, still garçon, and still fat.

Mrs. Sherbourne knew perfectly well what she was about, nor must the slightest approach to indiscretion be attributed to her. On the contrary, whatever she did on this occasion, and on many others, which by the ignorant might have been thought to have that appearance, deserved to be described by an epithet very decidedly the reverse. But Mrs. Sherbourne would as soon have thought of putting her impassioned language, her original views on all subjects, her boasted knowledge of Italian, or any other of her manifold accomplishments upon the shelf, as her beauty. Her prose and poetry, her hands and feet, her wit, and her white shoulders, her philosophy and her long ringlets, her large eyes and her little Italian vocabulary, were one and all part and parcel of herself, and one and all part and parcel “of that by which she lived.”

“This is so kind!—so very kind, Mr. Marchmont!” she said, as the gentleman entered, “bowed upon her hand,” and expressed his hopes that his early visit did not derange her occupations.

“My occupations! Alas! What occupation can you attribute to me that I should weigh against the pleasure of seeing you? In your position, Mr. Marchmont you know not what it is to feel as I do. Shall I pity you? I think I will, for never knowing the delight felt by the hopeless and forlorn, when a cheering ray of light shines upon them from—above.”

Mrs. Sherbourne pronounced the last word with a pretty playful smile, and with an action of her delicate hand, which though it a little deranged her slippery shawl, made her look altogether exceedingly graceful and animated.

“Good Heaven! Mrs. Sherbourne! How is it that I have lived thus long, and never known you till now? There is treason somewhere, and I must hunt it out. The herd, the envious herd, have plotted to keep us asunder, or we must have met!” exclaimed Marchmont, looking at her with a little real, and an immense deal of pretended admiration. “May I sit by you here?” he said, still holding her hand, and leading her towards the sofa.

“You may,” she replied in an accent difficult to describe, but which expressed at once timidity, confidence, incipient friendship, and that sort of pretty consciousness which gives to some ladies the air of a mouse, incessantly expecting to be pounced upon by a cat, but one for whom, by some strange perversity of their nature, they cannot feel all the detestation it ought to inspire.

“Well now, tell me,” said Mr. Marchmont, protectingly, “What is all this I hear about a play of yours that is going to be immediately brought out? Has this little hand been really bold enough to trace the exits and the entrances, the good and evil, the passion and the whim of life, through five long acts? What an extraordinary creature you are!”

“Oh! do not say so! It seems so like laughing at me! But what can I do! Alas! you know not my position. Woe is me, Mr. Marchmont, I must do something or perish.”

“Perish the universe first,” replied her visiter, with enthusiasm. “But why,” he added, “should you speak with regret of having been induced to exercise your charming genius upon the very highest order of poetical composition? It is a glory even to have thought of it.”

“But oh! the presumption! If you could but imagine the fluttering lars!” she replied, pressing her hands upon her bosom, “I am quite sure you would pity me.”

But Marchmont, besides being a lion and a gallant, is also a keen man of business; getting all the articles for the Regenerator from simpletons like young Chesterfield, the Genius, without payment, and managing to drive the best bargains possible with the Mrs. Sherbournes. (The mixture of the slashing critic, the enthusiastic poet, and the Lintot, is exceedingly amusing. To his assurances of his being most indulgent and favourable to her play, Mrs. Sherbourne, in broken and agitated speech, said:—

"I bless you!" in a voice that trembled like the silver chord of an unstrung lute (to borrow a phrase of her own); "and alas! my blessing, my prayers are all that I have left to give. Oh, Mr. Marchmont! you know not the trembling weakness of the insect you would save from perishing. One hostile word from you would act upon my very existence, like water shot at the poor humming-bird, which, light though it be, crushes its gossamer wing, and stills its feeble sound for ever!"

"Mrs. Sherbourne!" exclaimed the great critic in a voice of rapture: "as I hope to live, you are the most poetical creature I have met with for a century. You must work out that thought for my paper—it is quite beautiful."

Much more of the same sort passes; Mrs. Sherbourne is prevailed with to read her verses; and Mr. Marchmont finds them so delicious, that he forthwith makes prize of them for the Regenerator:—

Mrs. Sherbourne could not instantly make up her mind as to what she had better do, and she skilfully placed her embroidered pocket-handkerchief before her eyes while she hesitated. In truth, the question before her was not altogether an easy one. It very rarely happened that Mrs. Sherbourne, even in her most fascinating flirtations, forgot that the first great object in life, after five and thirty, is the wherewithal by which all that she most loved and liked was to be obtained. It was not therefore very likely that this wherewithal should escape her memory at the present moment; for it so happened that she thought the great master one of the ugliest fellows she had ever beheld, and would as soon have thought of giving away one of her rhapsodies to the first black-muzzled mastiff she met in the street, as to him. But he was a reviewer; one of the omnipotent we, a member of the secret tribunal, in whose frown there was death, and whose smile brought food, lodging, hackney-coaches, and satin-gowns. So she withdrew her handkerchief, looked up into his face with a delightful smile, and said, "Do with me as you will, my most kind friend!"

Mrs. Sherbourne managed to reimburse herself for the verses. The niece of the governor of the Philippine Islands who visited Gil Blas, was a fool to her. At a second meeting, Marchmont was much behind his time; and in the case of any other visitor, Mrs. Sherbourne would have been offended. But now—

That he should flirt with her faithfully and tenderly whenever they met, was but a secondary wish; that he should deal with her for a certain MS. which she had to dispose of was the first, and on this she was so intent that she was perfectly capable of forgiving his coming late, provided only that he came at last.

"I hardly know," she said, after the first affectionate greeting was over, "I hardly know whether I am most delighted or most ashamed to see you here! My heart fails me when I think how many things you may have been obliged to neglect, in order to come to me!"

"No, no, I never neglect anything, my charming Mrs. Sherbourne. Postponement is not neglect, you know. Show me the man who would postpone the affairs of half-a-score of the male creation, for the luxury of listening to words uttered by such lips and eyes as those before me,—show me such a one, and I will tell him frankly that he is not worthy to live. Thank Heaven! I am not so constituted."

"Still that flattering voice!" said Mrs. Sherbourne, with a sort of plaintive playfulness. "Alas! It is business—harsh, hateful, inexorable business that we must discuss to-day." Mr. Marchmont was decidedly a man of gallantry, and nowise unconscious of, or insensible to, his power over the female mind; but he knew also what was due to his station as editor and part proprietor of The Regenerator, and would not easily have forgiven himself had he suffered a flirtation with any woman breathing to make him unmindful of his interest. "You are right, dear madam," said he, suddenly permitting himself to sink down into a middle-aged man of business. "I shall be happy to hear what you have got to propose to me. It is my duty as well as my inclination to listen to you with the utmost attention."

"I am sadly unqualified for the task, Mr. Marchmont," she replied, "but nevertheless must screw my courage to it, for alas! it is necessary. I tremble to name it even, but there is a work that I wish to dispose of."

"I presume, Mrs. Sherbourne that it is either a tale, or a series of tales, or novelettes, which you are about to propose to me!" said Marchmont, as if rather eager to bring her to the point at once.

"No, sir—not so," she replied. "I flatter myself that I have something to propose considerably more worthy your attention. My life, Mr. Marchmont, has been a very remarkable one."

In short, it is her Memoirs, her Confessions, that Mrs. Sherbourne has to dispose of; and Mr. Marchmont's curiosity is abundantly piqued as to their nature, and saleableness, by her eloquent, if vague descriptions of the work in which she lays bare "her heart of hearts," and tells all the scandal she knows of her dear friends, and a little more.

The critic was by no means displeased by this description of the wares she offered, and really wished the fair sufferer to proceed in her catalogue raisonné of the subjects of her work; but could find nothing more original to say by way of tranquillising her spirits than the somewhat hackneyed phrase—"Compose yourself!"

"Compose myself!" she repeated meekly; and withdrawing her hands from her face, "You bid me compose myself, Mr. Marchmont, and with my hand on the sacred pages which I am about to violate, in order to sustain existence!" And here she spread her little hand upon a large thick volume which lay upon the table, and fixing her appealing eyes on her companion, shook her head and her curls most touchingly.

"This is the work then, is it?" said Mr. Marchmont, stretching out his hand rather eagerly to seize upon it.

"Yes! that is it," she replied. "That is the record of every thought and of every deed for the last fifteen years. But being such, you cannot, of course, my dear sir, for a single moment suppose that I would let it meet the eye of day till I am cold in earth!" and so saying, she too stretched forth her hand, and again laying it upon the precious manuscript, retained it in its place.

"But, my dear Mrs. Sherbourne!" exclaimed Mr. Marchmont, laughing, as it seemed, very heartily, "you are not going at your age to propose to me the purchase of a work which is not to be published till after your death? Could you at this moment see your own fair face, and youthful person, you would perceive as I do the—the—pardon me! the absurdity of the notion." And again he laughed aloud.

Mrs. Sherbourne fixed her eyes upon him with that sad heavy melancholy look which is produced by dropping the head and raising the eyes at the same time; and sighing profoundly, once again shook that fair head and all its ringlets with an action as melancholy as that of Hamlet's father's ghost.

"What is it you mean, charming Mrs. Sherbourne?" said Marchmont, looking very much as if he were inclined to laugh again.

"May I trust you?" she said, in a tone of deep solemnity. "May I?"

"Assuredly you may. Can you doubt it?"

"I may not, must not doubt it," she replied. "It is not my life that hangs upon my trust in you, but it is something infinitely dearer still—it is my honour."

Perhaps this might not have been the first time that words very like these had been addressed to Mr. Marchmont, and under ordinary circumstances he would have been extremely well able to understand what they meant; but at this moment, unless they were uttered prospectively, or prophetically, he could not understand them at all, and his looks probably expressed this, for Mrs. Sherbourne presently added, "Oh! you do not comprehend me! Alas! alas! you guess not what I mean!"

It was not easy to guess what Mrs. Sherbourne meant. It indeed transcends all imagination; yet we are assured, in a foot-note, that the actual scene is modelled on one that recently passed in Paris between a publisher and an authoress. Mr. Marchmont, from the glimpses he obtains of the work, becomes more and more desirous of purchasing, but fears actions for libel. He is reassured on this head, by the ingenuity of the lady, who contrives to say and insinuate a great deal of mischief, and yet steer clear of law; and the negotiation proceeds.

There is but one clause which proves a stumbling-block to the publisher; no part of the memoirs can appear until after the death of the fair author, and Marchmont remarks to her—

"You must be aware that at your age this condition must reduce the saleable value of the work to less than a tenth of what I might be tempted to give, were I privileged to put the first part of it into The Regenerator of next month."

"Next month!" repeated Mrs. Sherbourne, with something like a shudder, while her countenance, suddenly losing its gay and animated expression, assumed an aspect of the deepest melancholy. "Next month!—Ah! That is sudden."

"Nay, it would suit me very nearly as well if I could have it by the month after. But that is very different, you know, from putting it off till after your death."

Mrs. Sherbourne sighed heavily, and once more shook her head. "Alas!" she murmured, "You know not what you say! Before another month shall have begun, and ended its course, Mr. Marchmont, this little earthly tabernacle of a soul too mighty for it, will lay down to rest in its early grave for ever, and for ever!"

"What in God's name can you mean, my dear Mrs. Sherbourne!" said her companion, staring at her; "You really appear to me to be as likely to live as I am."

"Nature may, perhaps, be of the same opinion; for truly she is at work within me, as if she had no notion of the event which Fate sits smiling at. Will you deny, sir, that will—ay, woman's will—may be stronger than nature!"

"My dear madam, what do you mean! You cannot surely intend to destroy yourself!" said Mr. Marchmont, really looking a little terrified without any acting at all.

"Why not?" returned Mrs. Sherbourne, in the calm, quiet voice of philosophy. "Why not, my good sir! Tell me, why not!"

"Is it possible that you have so horrible an idea in your head!—But, no, it is impossible! You are not in earnest, Mrs. Sherbourne!"

"In my head, in my heart, in my very soul, and in that soul's master, my indomitable will!" replied Mrs. Sherbourne, with very sublime solemnity. "Marchmont, you know me not! Never, so help me, my good wit, and the next druggist's shop,—never will I live a coward in my own esteem, when death appears to me a better boon than life; No, Marchmont, not for an hour!"

"The thought is a sublime one, my charming friend, and were you other than what you are, I could not choose but admire it. But in your case, dear lovely Mrs. Sherbourne, the idea is not to be borne. For Heaven's sake, why should you kill yourself! Why should so terrible an idea find place in your bosom!"

"Simply, good friend, because I am weary of life. I have roamed from clime to clime, and—wherefore should I make a secret of it, when it is all written here, (laying her hand upon her manuscript,) from passion to passion—from peace to turmoil—and from joy to woe. I have tried all things, Marchmont, and all things that I have touched upon have returned an empty hollow sound, sadly unlike the music that I sought."

Marchmont, in short, is fairly bit; and at last, after sentiment is exhausted, he abruptly cries—

"It is almost cruel of you, Mrs. Sherbourne, to make me hate my own honesty; but for the life of me, I cannot tell a lie, when a question is put to me so directly. Yes, it is quite true, madam, and I grieve from my soul to say it,—it is quite true that I would give a higher price for a work so brought to a conclusion, than for the same work finished under other circumstances." And having thus spoken, Mr. Marchmont sat very gloomily looking upon the carpet, with his brows knit, and his arms folded, as if he was very unhappy indeed.

"With my last breath shall my spirit bless you, Marchmont!" said Mrs. Sherbourne in reply. "You have proved yourself to be the noble being I have heretofore been taught to think you. It is now proper that I should let you know that I have already settled everything. Of course you pledge me your most sacred word that all which now passes between us is under the most solemn seal of secrecy."

"Of course," replied Mr. Marchmont gloomily.

"Then of course, my dear, my best, my latest friend, I can have no further reserve with you—nor you with me. THE EVENT is fixed, immutably fixed, Marchmont, to take place on the 27th of September. Reasons, which you will understand when you come to read my manuscript, have led me to fix that day. O Heavens! It will be the happiest I have known for years! No day will pass, till its arrival, Marchmont, without my adding something to this chequered record. Oh! it is a mosaic, made up of all the lights and shades of my much rain-bowed life! There is gloom herein, black as the dimmest smoke of hell, my friend; but there are tints too, bright as the glowing glory of a seraph's wing, where sunbeams blend with dew!"

There was something in the cadence of this speech so exceedingly touching, that Mr. Marchmont was actually obliged to cover his face with both his hands, in order to conceal his emotion. It must, indeed, have been a very hard heart that could have remained untouched by it.

"Now then, to conclude this trying interview," she resumed in accents more prosaic, "Now then, tell me, Mr. Marchmont, what sum you will be willing to give me immediately by cheque, on account—and tell me also for what additional sum you will engage to account to any friend I may appoint to receive it when all is over."

The internal calculations which took place in the mind of the Regenerator before he could answer this question were of a homely accurate kind, which would fall but uncouthly on the mind of a reader after perusing the foregoing truly touching scene. Neither can the answer which he ultimately gave be fairly considered as matter of legitimate history. Suffice it, therefore, to say, that a cheque was given, and that the parties separated, mutually satisfied by the result of their very interesting interview.

Mrs. Sherbourne in the meanwhile, having learned that Charles Chesterfield has been left a legacy of some thousand pounds, which he will receive on coming of age, contrives to inveigle him into a written promise of marriage, and manages to work a great many presents out of him. After using many manoeuvres, and enduring much humiliation in getting her play produced—artifices even more degrading than those we have seen, as she has for a patron a mysterious Duke, who commands the manager to bring it out—it is damned. Yet she continues to play her own part as dexterously as ever.

The gentleman, who had given her the cheque for value, only to be employed after the fatal 27th of September, meanwhile paid her frequent, watchful visits. It was necessary that he Should perceive that she was gradually and gloomily approaching day by day to the moment that was to be for her "the end of all here," when, by the unflinching action of her steadfast will and ready hand, she should "put off this mortal coil," and place in his hands the marketable commodity of a gay life's record, with the piquant blasphemy of self-destruction at the end of it.

To Chesterfield, whose visits were not only frequent, but daily, it was equally necessary to show herself full of life and love, of hope and joy—with no other malady than the sweet torment caught from Cupid's dart, and no deeper sorrow than his caresses could assuage and his devotion cure. From "her dear Public," and her friends at large, both these states of mind were to be concealed with quite as much care as they were respectively to be exhibited to the individuals already mentioned; yet all these seemingly incompatible duties she performed regularly, steadily, and effectually, without even permitting either to interfere with the others.

If by some mal-à-propos accident, absolutely unavoidable, Mr. Marchmont and Charles met at her lodgings, she contrived to make each feel, without any mixture of doubt on the subject, that she most heartily wished the other away. When she smiled and spoke with gentle gaiety to Chesterfield, Marchmont immediately comprehended that she was exerting a most extraordinary degree of resolution in order to conceal from him the inward darkness of her melancholy death-desiring soul; and when she permitted a glance, gloomy as a midnight storm, to darken her fair face as she looked at her literary executor, her youthful lover sympathized with the unconquerable feeling which made her deem any interruption to a tête à tête with himself, intolerable.

If, as it often happened, she found herself en face to both, and to an admiring circle besides, she varied her trickery from vivacity, which, while it enchanted the crowd, caused secret admiration at her extraordinary self-control in her two initiated friends—to a languor, which, though it made her recline with eyes half shut, and a flacon at her nose, permitted her to assume every possible position by which a foot, a hand, and a world of drooping ringlets, could be best displayed; and at the same time it gave occasion to the most satisfactory commentaries in the minds of those more particularly concerned as to the feelings so evidently overpowering to her.

But Mr. Marchmont could not wait for ever. One morning he went to the cell of the self-condemned in Mount Street.

Mrs. Sherbourne, notwithstanding her mortuary state of mind, was little changed in dress or manner since we last parted from her. The entire collection of her various charms was as much at her command as ever; nevertheless when Mr. Marchmont entered, the only one of all the enchanting throng permitted to appear was gentle, desponding languor. The delicate left hand hung listlessly by her side, while the delicate right hand held a pen suspended over a sheet of half-covered paper, as if waiting for the inspiration that should set it in motion. Her large eyes were raised to greet him, but then fell again as if the very lids sought repose, while her very ringlets seemed to droop in sorrow, and her drapery too, carelessly arranged, evidently shared the same species of desponding listlessness which pervaded her whole appearance. She intended to look like a lily on a broken stalk,—and perhaps she did.

"I hope you are better to-day in health and spirits, Mrs. Sherbourne!" said the Regenerator, who, having determined immediately to print her Memoirs in weekly numbers, began to fear that the promised catastrophe would be delayed longer than might be convenient, and that it was high time to inquire about it.

"Better!—Yes, much better, Mr. Marchmont. Better by the hours that I have drawn nearer to my longed-for end!"

"You still go on writing I see. If you really persevere in your shocking intention, my dear Mrs. Sherbourne, it is extraordinary that you should have strength and spirits for it," said the purchaser of her Memoirs, looking at her with rather a suspicious glance.

"I have yet an object for which to live a few weeks longer," she replied. "In preparing for the event which is about to come upon me, and dividing papers which I wish to destroy, from others that may perhaps prove of some interest when I am no more, I chanced to light upon a correspondence between myself and one of the chief actors in that peculiarly interesting transaction which took place some years ago between a certain lord and lady whose adventures I think never will be forgotten while the language lasts. Every letter of the whole series is preserved. They are full of piquant anecdotes, and my object is to incorporate the whole into the narrative of my own eventful life.—You know these names, Mr. Marchmont?"

Mrs. Sherbourne languidly, and as if by a strong effort, turned towards him the unfinished page, and pointed to the words he was to read, though her delicate fingers trembled as she did so.

"Know them? Egad, their names, at least, are no great mystery. You are quite right, Mrs. Sherbourne, if you can bring out anything new on that subject, not to omit it. It will be a great addition."

"It is agony to me now, to labour at anything. But there is a poor old woman, who nursed my sickly infancy, for whom I am determined to make a small sum before my lips open to receive what fools call poison, but which I call peace. If you will pay me for these pages you shall have them, Marchmont. I have no earthly tribunal to fear, and therefore I have written boldly. The pages on this subject I know are worth their weight in gold. What will you give me for them?"

"We will talk of that presently, Mrs. Sherbourne," replied the Regenerator. "But I want you to explain to me, why you, in your very peculiar and melancholy situation, should think it worth while to enter into correspondence with a young fellow like Charles Chesterfield. What can be your motive for it?"

"He has made you his confidant, has he?" exclaimed the lady with sudden energy, and losing in an instant every trace of languor. "A pretty puppy, isn't he! But if you are his friend and adviser, Mr. Marchmont, be pleased to tell him that I have not done with him yet, and that if he is a wise man, he will come to me immediately. His doing so may save him from the most fatal exposure and dishonour."

"What am I to think, Mrs. Sherbourne, of this sudden change of manner! Of this explicit avowal of your interest in one so very little fitted to be in your confidence at this awful period? Gracious heaven!" he exclaimed, looking earnestly in her face; "have I been fooled out of my money! are you suddenly losing your senses, madam! or do you really sit there to laugh at me?"

The lady burst forth at these words into a vehement, but well arranged paroxysm of laughter; and she had not looked more enchanting for years, for this was one of the prettiest things she did, displaying her fine teeth, and permitting sundry capricious involutions of person, all of which displayed advantageously some favourite grace.

The Regenerator was perfectly overpowered by his indignation, and it was some time before he could recover himself sufficiently to speak; but at length he said, "Madam! this is swindling. Are you aware of it! Are you aware of the pains and penalties attached by the law to the act of raising money under false pretences! Are you aware of it?"

"My dear sir," replied the lady in the sweetest accents possible, and retaining no more of her offensive merriment than was expressed in a most charming smile—"My dear Mr. Marchmont do you intend to go to law with me, in case I should happen to decline killing myself?"

The Regenerator rose from his chair, snatched his hat, gave her one look of extraordinary eloquence, and rushed out of the house without even pausing to close the door behind him.

This is the climax of the art of publication on an author's part. Mrs. Sherbourne merits to have her memory toasted with that of Napoleon for having done a bookseller.

From the lectures with which the oracle of the Regenerator indoctrinates his pupil and protégé Chesterfield, the entire secrets of modern successful authorship may be learned. All literature is now comprehended in two grand divisions, the transcendental and the burlesque. So said Mr. Marchmont; and Chesterfield, who placed all his glory in being allowed to appear in the pages of the Regenerator, modestly requested for a specimen of excellence in each of these styles. The Transcendental he obtains in form of a desperate tale, entitled Desperation, in the Ainsworth and Dickens style, which contains a copious admixture of the burlesque, the one style heightening the effect of the other. The secret of the burlesque is very successfully shown by a pretty, light, and graceful prologue, which Chesterfield has written gratis for Mrs. Sherbourne's play, being turned into it, by the simple process of changing all the v's into w's, and vice versa, and by sinking the aspirates, and supplying superfluous h's. Marchmont says—

"Your prologue, in the state you gave it to me, could have produced no possible effect, except setting the good people to sleep before their time, which would not have been fair, you know, to Mrs. Sherbourne. But if distinctly delivered as I have left it, having merely transposed every v and w throughout the four stanzas, and managed the aspirates according to the laws of modern wit, the effect, as you will see, will be electrical. Nobody can stand it. The young, the old, the grave, the gay, all yield together to the mysterious spell (forgive the pun) produced by this mode of writing. Yet it is a very simple operation. But it may perhaps be necessary for you repeatedly to note the fact, before you can be able to conceive it."

Chesterfield could not be made all at once to comprehend the mighty spell, which produces such effects. At a subsequent interview he says—

"Shall I confess to you, that even now I do not well understand the reason of your altering the spelling of my lines. Why does every body enjoy it so much?"

"Is it possible that you do not yourself taste the exquisite burlesque?" demanded Marchmont, looking at him with genuine astonishment.

"I perceive that the words so pronounced sound very strangely, but they might be made to sound more strangely still, if more letters were changed," observed Charles.

"Egad, that's very true, boy, and I don't know but we might make some use of it—but it must be in a totally different manner. This, you see, is genuine London lingo. The manner, you know, in which the very lowest of the people talk in the streets."

"Is it indeed?" said Charles.

"To be sure it is. Didn't you know that?" returned Mr. Marchmont, in a tone of considerable contempt.

"I had no idea of it, sir. You know I have never been in London before, and as yet I have walked very little in the streets. It seems to me, then," added the young man, musingly, "that this species of composition is intended wholly for London!"

"Nonsense! That's utter nonsense, Chesterfield. The whole world must learn the cockney tongue, if they do not know it already. I tell you once for all, that cockney slang, and cockney pronunciation is the very essence, the very marrow, the very life and soul of English wit at the present day; and if you don't understand it, you must learn to understand it; and if you don't like it, you must learn to like it; and if you refuse to make use of it, you may just shut up shop and run away."

"I will learn it, I will like it, and I will make use of it," exclaimed Charles, eagerly.

We have the authority of the "Quarterly Review" for saying that the greatest admirers of this sort of lingo, and of the heroes and heroines that use it, are ladies of rank and fashion, who soar above the vulgar trammels and strait-lacing of middle-life society. This should satisfy Mrs. Trollope, who is a great stickler for social order, of the propriety and legitimacy of cockney slang and of the style of the slang-whangers.

The reader will have a better idea of the tone of this production from these extracts than from anything we can say. The satire is free and unsparing, and far, we fear, from being wholly uncalled for, whether as respects editors, critics, publishers, or authors. Yet is the novel anything but fair as a general picture of those classes; and, from its very structure and object, an acrid production.

ON THE RECENT PROSECUTION OF THE PUBLISHER OF "SHELLEY'S POEMS."

WHILE fools and rogues may safely write,
In servile praise and aland'rous spite,
Aught that o'er shadows Reason's light
And darkens Hope—
Till man, e'en here, in hellish night
His way shall grope;

The ministers of Famine's reign
Rake up old statutes, that would chain
Our last immortal poet's strain
In the mute cell,
Wherein new laws have lately lain
The "dustman's bell."

Were human hearts all dead and cold
As those judicial robes unfold,
And barren as the "legal" mould
In which they delve;
Or dead to love—save love of gold—
Like many a "twelve:"

The poet's light might well be hid,
By the law's useless pyramid,—
Reared o'er Corruption's coffin-lid,
By children true;
To sanction with the wrongs he did
All they can do!

But 'tis not so!—the voice of song
Is yet too musical and strong,
For falsehood and familiar wrong
Unmoved to hear;
And the disguise they've worn so long
They trembling wear

What, though the light of morning lag
Beneath the Orient's purple orage,
Do these silk-gowned and surpliced hags,
Whose night is done,
Expect, with their few fluttering rags,
To hide the sun! L. D.

MEMOIRS OF JEREMY BENTHAM.

BY JOHN BOWRING.

PART XI.

DUMONT, ROMILLY, LORD SHELBURNE, AND OTHER CELEBRATED CONTEMPORARIES.

BENTHAM reached Crichef in February 1786, and left it in October or November 1787. He says, "I stole out of the Russian dominions. There was no harm in my stealing out; but there was considerable harm in my stealing out with me a Swede, who represented himself to be of noble blood. He wrote an admirable hand, and spoke seven or eight languages: having been two years in the English service, he was perfectly master of English. He had presented himself to me in my brother's absence, soliciting employment. He had married a Polish lady of rank, but how they lived I know not." He was, however, delighted to be taken into service, and Bentham employed him in copying. Seeing his capacity, Sir Samuel, on his return, made the Swede a serjeant, and, of course, enrolled him, and gave him a uniform. When Bentham got weary of his exile and wished to get away—distant 1500 miles from any port—he could not accomplish it, ignorant as he was of the languages of the countries through which he had to pass; so he determined, at all risks, to take the polyglot Swede with him as a servant,—and that without leave, as leave could not be obtained. Bentham consulted General Bander, who warned him of the perils to which he would expose the Swede and himself, and of the heavy character of the offence should it be discovered. But Bentham had other perplexities,—and among them, not the least, was the want of money,—so he sold off a second-hand chariot which he had sent from England to his brother, and his brother never used; and engaged the Swede who, though he was undoubtedly a great linguist, was a still greater liar: however, he was most anxious to escape from barbarous Russia to civilized Europe, and to avail himself of the occasion Bentham's departure offered him. At Crichef money was not among obtainable things; and the resources which Bentham had spent in coming, and which had been provided principally by his uncle, were not to be replenished.

The Swedish serjeant wore, of course, a serjeant's uniform; but when Bentham had to ask a passport for his Liudi (or follower,) the business was to destroy the serjeant's identity; and a coat was found with a broad edging—finery which both the Benthams had worn in turn. They started from Zadobras in a kibitka made for the journey. It had a mattress covered with leather prepared at the tannery, but very offensive from the strong odour of the birchwood bark. However, in this lay Bentham, covered with a couple of Turkish shawls, which he had bought at Constantinople. The tanner in chief was an English Quaker; and his wife (a Quakeress) kindly prepared the only food the travellers had for their journey, except when they reached a town. Part of the supply Bentham found so delicious, that, instead of consuming it, he brought it as presents to his friends in England. It was a compound of honey and apples, of the consistency of a rusk—the apples of which it was made having been brought from Kiev. The apprehension of being stopped was constantly haunting Bentham; and the journey was performed with perpetual trepidation, until they passed the Polish frontier; and divers discoveries of the mendacious propensities of his Swedish companion did not add to his comfort. Bentham was both cheated and robbed in his progress.

Bentham stopped at Warsaw, intending to pay his respects to King Stanislaus, whose correspondent he had been, through Lind, the king's agent in England. But bashfulness and gloominess interfered. He stayed a week at Warsaw, and saw nobody. He called on the British minister, and not finding him at home did not repeat his visit.

At Berlin he was in somewhat better spirits, and made the acquaintance of Dr. Brown, the king's physician. Brown was an idolater of Scott, the present Lord Eldon, whom Bentham hated as much as it was possible to his benevolent nature to hate—considering him the mightiest and most mischievous of all the opponents of law reform.

Chemistry was a favourite study of Bentham's. In 1783 he had translated "Bergman's Essay on the Usefulness of Chemistry;"* and he mustered up courage enough to call on Klaproth, who was then living there in very handsome style. So little was Bentham's name or writings known at this time, that he was introduced as Mr. Bentham, a gentleman of considerable fortune. He had something to recommend him to Klaproth, for he brought a specimen of asbestos of remarkable beauty—of a green colour, divided into filaments of inconceivable fineness.

"At the Hague," he says, "I dined with Sir James Harris, where I went with the son of the lickspittle to the Duke of Newcastle, who was the dirtiest fellow I ever heard of, and when at school we used to shut the doors against him. Sir James wanted to introduce me to the Stadtholder; but he was a foolish fellow, and I should only have stared at one who would only have stared at me.

"At Hanover," said Bentham, "I was amused by the picture of the Duke of York (apt illustration of royalty!) pulling his fool's nose before the whole Court.

"In Holland, I was very much scandalized at seeing men and maidens proclaiming their lust—(lust is the word for pleasure—as lust-huis, pleasure-house; lust-garden, pleasure-garden.)"

* Murray, 1783.

I extract what follows, from Bentham's reminiscences of persons of celebrity with whom he came in contact at about this period :—

"Baron Massares was an honest fellow, who resisted Lord Mansfield's projects for establishing despotism in Canada. He occupied himself in mathematical calculations to pay the national debt, and a good deal about Canadian affairs. There was a sort of simplicity about him, which I once quizzed, and then repented. I had not studied the Deontological principle as I have studied it since.

"In 1788, I belonged to a Club, where we had a frugal supper together, the guests consisting of Fordyce, John Hunter, Sir Joseph Banks, Solander, Lovell Edgeworth, Mill the architect, Ramsden the instrument maker, Cummin the watchmaker,—and we talked over the news : there was nothing of form. It was rather uncomfortable for me, as I could add nothing to the interest of the Club. Fordyce, when he introduced me, communicated to nobody his opinion of me, which was high. He fancied he should see me Master of the Rolls. When my brother sent me a quantity of stuffed birds from Russia, Hunter fell in love with a huge box, and when he had performed some operation, he took the box as his fee. Mrs. Ramsden was a clever woman, the sister of Dolland."

Of the Fordyces, Bentham said on another occasion,—“I think George Fordyce had twenty uncles by the father's side. The head of the family had some great place under Government. He was too grand a personage to look at Dr. George Fordyce. It was an unfortunate time when I knew him first. His laboratory took fire, and he had nothing to exhibit with but a small portable furnace, with a few vials and common things. He had acquired a certain celebrity. He was a member of a Chess club with C. J. Fox. He had no conversation. What he said, he said in a paradoxical shape, with a silly expression. There was generally a good deal that was true with a little bit that was false. He acquired about £10,000, got by books, lecturing, and practice. He left it between his two daughters. My brother married one of them.—(Who married the other daughter? said I)—Nobody! That's a captious, interrupting question! His plan was, that the youngest should marry, and the eldest remain with him; but just the reverse took place. His wife was clever at all sorts of handyworks, botany, &c. : latterly she amused herself by making coverlets for beds. She made acres of them. He had one son, whose loss at the age of 14 made a deep impression on him. He was, on the whole, the coldest of the cold Scotch. He approved, he said, of every atom of the Introduction to Morals and Legislation. He had originality, and valued it in others. In my love of Chemistry it would have been a privilege for me had Fordyce possessed a chemical apparatus. I should have been supremely happy to have known anybody who possessed one. My chamber was spacious. There was a grate, and over the grate a chimney-piece; and in one corner a closet apart to hold chemical things. I broke a hole through the wall, (it was not perceived,) and put in a pane of glass to light my closet.

"Among the members of the St. Paul's Churchyard Club, to which I belonged, with Dr. Johnson, was Tasso Hoole. He was one of Dr. Johnson's lickspittles. He had, I think, a place at the East India House; and got money by plays and translations, which he got people to subscribe for. He even asked me for subscriptions, though he lived in style—asked me who lived in beggary! He got me to subscribe; and Chamberlain Clark forced him to give back the money again. I went once to the rehearsal of one of his plays.

"I knew Lord St. Helens through my brother,—he was ambassador at Petersburg. My chambers in Lincoln's Inn were opposite chambers occupied by Lord St. Helens' elder brother, Fitzherbert, who had been member for Derbyshire, but had over-spent himself, and was rather in bad plight. He married a lady of the name of Purvis, respecting which marriage there was a famous suit. Fitzherbert and I had been schoolfellows at Westminster, which he had remembered, but I had forgotten; but as I was a dwarfish phenomenon, this was not unnatural, for he was no phenomenon; and there was some intercourse between us. Lord St. Helens was extremely intelligent. He frequently attended the Privy-council, and he showed me an account of the assassination of Paul of Russia.

"Fitzherbert had travelled with the Duke of Devonshire, and through him, I believe, he got his baronetcy. I was once asked to a formal dinner. There came in a Mr. Stone, who had been secretary to the English ambassador in Paris. He sat down to the harpsichord, and played Marlbrook, the first time, I believe, it had been played in England. He was a son or nephew of Andrew Stone whom we read of—for he was a personage. We had excellent punch, made of fine spirits which had come from his estate in Barbadoes. Lord St. Helens was sent for by the king immediately after dinner, and left us. There was also a French refugee bishop."

In 1788, I find the first notice of Dumont, to whom Romilly had sent some of Bentham's writings. He was struck with their originality and their power; and said the author was worthy to serve the cause of liberty. The MSS. were in French, and Dumont offered to rewrite portions, and to superintend the publication of the whole. He calls himself the "unknown friend" (Ami inconnu.)

He devoted a great part of what remained of his life to translating the works, and giving legislative effect to the opinions of Bentham, in Switzerland, and, as far as he was able, in France, through Mirabeau his friend, and in some sort his pupil. It was through Lord Lansdowne the acquaintance was cemented; and I find the strongest recommendation of Dumont's aptitude in Lord L.'s letters. But of Mirabeau, Lord L. had a very mean opinion. He says of him,—“As to Count Mirabeau,—I always looked upon our friend Romilly as a man of great honour and discretion; but I have been always astonished at his courage in risking a connexion with such a man. In short, I am not at all afraid of you, should you be engaged in a controversy with him, but it's madness to hazard any communication with him.” Mirabeau seems, however, to have been very inattentive to Romilly's correspondence, for Romilly says in a letter to Bentham, "He (Mirabeau) never writes to me, nor answers my letters."

Dumont first communicated extracts from Bentham's writings to the "Courrier de Provence," and writes to Bentham "that the papers were thought sound and useful, and had been well received." "Continue your course," he says, "and march courageously, for the goal is in view. The suffrages of the few who think, will repay you for the indifference of the many—the reputation of one book prepares the way for another." In another letter Dumont says,—“In the name of your own honour, finish what you have begun, and be not diverted from your object. You are young enough for a kingdom of this world. Write and bridle my wandering opinions.”

The intimacy with Romilly became more active on Bentham's return to England. It had been engoué with the "Fragment." "George Wilson brought about our acquaintance. I knew him before I went abroad, and we dined together in 1784 in Chancery Lane. Our acquaintance had not then ripened into an intimacy; but on my return in 1788, I met him one day at Lord Lansdowne's, where I also met Dumont, who had been introduced there during my absence. Great was my surprise, and a most agreeable surprise it was, to meet Romilly at Lord Lansdowne's table.

"Romilly's father was a jeweller. He was of a refugee family, no better than a Huguenot. There was a preacher of the name, I think. He had a brother and a sister. The sister is the mother of Dr. Roget. The brother failed in business. When I first knew Romilly, he was in Gray's Inn. I remember calling on him, and seeing there another man's puss, which excited my concupiscence. I was very amorous of the puss, for the puss was singularly virtuous and as interesting to me as a two-legged creature. Our love for pusses—our mutual respect for animals—was a bond of union. For pusses and mouses we had both of us great kindness. George Wilson had a disorder which kept him two months to his couch. The mouses used to run up his back and eat the powder and pomatum from his hair. They used also to run up my knees when I went to see him. I remember they did so to Lord Glenberrie, who thought it odd.

"No doubt it was Romilly who mentioned me to Dumont. Dumont introduced him to Lord Lansdowne. Dumont got intimate with Mirabeau, for whom he wrote many of his addresses to his co-metians. He talked to me on various subjects, and I mentioned my papers on legislation. He expressed a desire to see them, and, having read them, asked me to allow him to use them, to which I consented. I gave him the Introduction, which was written in 1781, and published in 1789. It stuck for eight years, in consequence of the coldness of Lord Camden, and Dunning; the former of whom said to Lord Lansdowne that he found a difficulty in understanding it, and therefore others would. Afterwards, however, something I wrote made a strong impression in my favour. Lord Lansdowne was intimately connected with Sir Eardley Wilmot, who had been Chief Justice of the Common Pleas. During Warren Hastings' trial, there was a curious question of evidence: it was referred to me, and there was a great notion raised by this communication of my sagacity on this particular matter. My views were not favourable to Lord Lansdowne's views; for on this occasion they bore against Hastings, and he took the side of Hastings because King George the Third had taken his side. Lord Lansdowne referred the paper to Sir Eardley Wilmot, who lauded it. I did not like Sir Eardley, on account of his conduct in a case of negro slavery, when he gave damages of only one shilling in favour of the negro, and wanted to reserve the point of law. I thought the case was one where so much injury had been inflicted, that the award of one shilling excited my indignation;—one shilling for a man torn away from his family, and perhaps ruined by the law process!"

I have exhibited some of the early impressions of Bentham respecting Lord Shelburne. His later opinions were these:—

"Lord Shelburne had a way of talking in fits and starts. His mind seemed always in a state of agitation with the passion of ambition and the desire of splendour. He was never much at ease, for he always outran the constable, and involved himself monstrously in debt. He showed me his rent roll. There was an enormous sum which I did not understand: it was so much due to his creditors. He had had a most wretched education, and a foolish father and mother, of whose management of him he always talked with horror. When I once spoke to him of the family mausoleum, he refused to show it to me; for he said it was associated with such disgraceful recollections. His father gave all the property he could to a younger brother, Fitzmaurice, amounting to £10,000 a-year. The Petrys had been Barons of some place (whose name I forget) for four and twenty generations. They were among the first conquerors of Ireland. He did not, however, talk in the pride of ancestry. What endears his memory to me is, that, though ambitious of rising, he was desirous of rising by means of the people. He was really radically disposed; and he witnessed the French Revolution with sincere delight. He had quarrelled with the Whig aristocracy, who did not do him justice; so he had a horror of the clan, and looked towards them with great bitterness of feeling. That bitterness did not break out in words, though of him they spoke most bitterly. There was artifice in him, but also genuine good feelings. His head was not clear. He felt the want of clearness. He spoke in the house with grace and dignity, yet he uttered nothing but vague generalities. He took much pains to consult particular men. I remember going with him to Warwick castle for a week. There came a man from Birmingham, a man of great eminence, whom he had sent for, to get all manner of details in relation to some branch of political economy. His name, I think, was Gabbett, and he was a manufacturer of oil of vitriol; and was, I believe, the grandfather of Lady Romilly, with whom Romilly became acquainted at Bowood, and carried on the courtship there. I heard her spoken slightly of in the Bowood family, as if not strong in understanding; but I thought her understanding both strong and sound."

Some of Bentham's correspondence of this period (1788) with France, throws light upon the passions which so soon broke out in such ungoverned fury. One letter of the 12th November, says:—"Our great men are exasperating the nation by language which cannot but make them unpopular. One Grand Seigneur,—and what is worse, one of the notables,—said the troops did not fire on the people, but only on the populace,—a distinction with which people and populace are sufficiently exasperated. Our debates are carried on as barbarously as in the time of Charlemagne,—our national character seems opposed to sedate deliberation. We have little moderation in our expressions, and less logic in our reasonings. We are too impetuous and too vain. Every one seeks to display his talent (esprit),—nobody seems to think about enforcing conviction. As if we had not enough to do with a few great and grave matters, only think of Neckar's submitting to the Assembly from fifty to eighty questions, any one of which would require an age of time, and a legislature of Solons to solve,—and he says, 'answer them all in a few weeks.' You are celebrating the centenary of your public liberties. Noblest of Te Deums! Would we had such to celebrate,—but we dare not even to announce the celebration of yours! The censors struck out the notice from the Mercure. There seems no bound to our wanderings. It is indeed but the French history of the past. Brittany is amusing herself with a riot,—the nobility and the tiers état with mutual recriminations of abuse. The court is appealed to for troops to enable one province to come to blows with another. Béarn is loudly clamouring for separation. Paris is full of pamphlets and pamphleteers, who and which only entangle more the too much entangled question. Some demand the pure democracy of Appenzell,—others a tyrant king and a free people. Everything tends to detach and to alienate,—nothing to unite. M. Delacretelle announces that, 'France is about to give the noblest lessons to other nations.' So be it,—but let me shroud myself in silence."

Bentham was originally introduced to Brissot by Dr. Schwediaur.

"Brissot was a little weak man, ignorant of the world. He would establish a Lyceum, and that Lyceum consisted of M. Brissot, Madame Brissot, and your humble servant. He married, having nothing to maintain a wife with. She was a pretty Frenchwoman. His influence was due to a great fluency in writing. He kept up a daily newspaper himself. It was a mighty small thing, but he could be depended on; and he became the organ of a party that could depend upon him, and depend upon nobody else. He really erected a public-opinion tribunal of his own, which raised him to be the head of his party. His conversation was not remarkable. Poor fellow! I had occasion to mortify him more than once by opposing his plans. He brought me a literary project in which one Mirza, a Persian gentleman, was to shine. I did not know it was his, and laughed at it—but he took it in good part. Once I was sitting in a chair at one end of the room, and I said to him, "Ayez la bonté de—" He said, "You are not a Frenchman, and may be forgiven; but a Frenchman would have said, 'Voulez vous avoir la bonté'—but withal he was a good-natured gentle creature. We used to talk of terms of locution. I suggested to say the word champ for field of thought and action, but he would not listen to it—it was not Français. I paid a German £60—as far as I could go, for translating Morals and Legislation. He translated Standard "Maasregal," which Lord Glenbervie disapproved of."

One cannot forget the testimony rendered to Brissot's integrity by Girey Dupré, the young man who presented himself as ready to die before his judge—his hair cut close—his neck bare—his shirt-collar on his shoulders—his hands behind him. When asked if he had known Brissot, he answered boldly,—“Yes,—he lived like Aristides—he died like Sydney;” and Dupré followed him to the scaffold.

The want of acquaintances, which in early life was felt by Bentham as so great a grievance, was gradually supplied. Desirous of instruction, few had been the means of instruction which were allowed to him, beyond those which school and university afforded; and the narrow and monkish system of education which then prevailed, was not very favourable to the development of the mental faculties. Bentham, too, had strong affections, to which he would willingly have found a response from the breasts of others; but in his youth this happiness was denied him. Mr. Foster, who has been before mentioned, was an instrument through whom Bentham obtained some knowledge of the world.

Mr. Foster's friendship, his brother's long residence in White Russia and connexion with the Court, and his own travels in Russia, had naturally established connexions in that country. He used to speak of two brothers of the name of Tatishchev, whose fraternal fondness for each other created in his mind a strong affection for both. There was also a Ronzow—a natural son of Woronzow, for in Russia illegitimate children lose the first syllable of their father's name. The Tatishchevs were idolators of the Empress Catherine—to them a sort of goddess divine; and they so lauded her "Esprit de legislation," that Bentham longed to be engaged in her service, and would willingly have gone "to codify" on the banks of the Neva.

In a letter to Colonel Bentham, dated 2d May 1788, he gives the following particulars of his homeward journey from Russia, and of his way of life after his return:—

"How to begin a letter, even to you, after so long an interruption of intercourse? Well, the pen, by a prodigious effort has been set a-going, and now let it run on. At Berlin I arrived 16th-27th December—lounged there rather more than a fortnight, waiting, the greatest part of the time, for the cursed Opera, put off from day to day by the indisposition of a cursed actress, the woman (Foote I think her name is) you have heard at Petersburg. Dr. Brown is doing there very well. A great part of my time was, of course, passed with him. I saw Mrs. Brown a few days ago here, on her way to Berlin, with their five children, by Hamburg, for which place, I imagine, they are already sailed. He had written to Benson a letter full of indignation, for his rascality to you; and I found Mrs. B. in the same sentiments. I was about a fortnight crawling post from Berlin to Holland through vile roads. I passed through Potsdam, Magdeburg, Brunswick, and Osnaburg. The finest situation by far, in so much of Germany as I travelled through, is Bentheim.* I don't know whether I ever showed you an old MS. I have, which pretends that we are descended from the Counts of that country. I did not expect to have found the pretension confirmed by the identity of the arms. Of three or four coats which I observed in stone, on one side of the romantic castle, which is the family residence pertaining to the several counties which, it seems, centre in that family, one is composed of the thingumbobs called cinq-foils, which you will find in your seal. The county is likely to be extinct, it seems, for want of heirs; and the Elector of Hanover has a large mortgage upon it. When the count dies, you may give my compliments to the empress, and desire she would lend us a body of troops to assert our claim. I lounged about ten days in Holland, seeing Sir James [Harris], and as much as could well be seen of the Dutch towns in that time. I reached London a few days before my birth-day: that is to say (for you remember neither day, month, nor time of the year) February 14-25. Q. S. P. [his father] of course in great joy, of which he has given you, no doubt, abundant particulars. His memory and bodily strength begin to fail him, but in other respects he is in mighty good health, humour, and spirits. His circumstances are, upon the whole, rather improved, I think, than impaired, since I left England, and his disposition towards us is certainly rather grown better, if there were room for it, than worse. Farr [Abbott] and I are upon as sociable terms as it is in his nature to be with anybody besides his mother and brothers. He has just migrated for the summer to his country-house. During the winter I received frequent particular invitations, though no general one. The principal cement is his wife, who plays prettily on the harpsichord, and is a mighty good creature, but timid to an excess. His behaviour is as respectful as ever. Charles I see but little of. His business increases considerably; and he is said to deserve it. Lord Lansdowne vastly civil: upon occasion of Hastings' trial, has put himself to school to me about evidence. He has accused himself repeatedly, and sans ménagement, for not offering me a place when he was in: and commissioned me to consider what would suit me in case of his coming in again. He supposes I should prefer a place at one of the Boards, to engaging in what is called politics, viz. coming into Parliament with a precarious place. Whether he meant all this, or whether the use of it was to make me contribute to make people think he was to come in, I cannot take upon me to say. Perhaps partly one, and partly t'other; but my notion is, he never will come in, in any efficient place. As for me, my real thoughts being upon that, as upon all other occasions, as you know, the easiest for me to give, I gave them him—viz. that I was not fit for a place, and that if I were, I should not wish to have one—that I hoped always to be happy enough to preserve his good opinion, and so forth, and that was enough for me. P. C. [Colquhoun] is as zealous a friend of yours as ever. He has been showing Vermicular to George Melville—who is a very busy amateur in everything that is in any way connected with mechanics—and to Davis's friend; Lord H. Melville, he says, is much pleased with it. On the cover, as returned by P. C., I see—'Lord H. to return particular thanks for the inspection of the enclosed papers.' Whether that betokens approbation, I cannot pretend to say, P. C. not having seen his Lordship when I saw him last. He is certainly of my way of thinking about Usury. He brought Owen Cambridge to me t'other day, to acknowledge himself a proselyte; but you don't know who Owen Cambridge is, and it would take up too much room to tell you. I shall endeavour to send you a copy of the defence with this, as likewise another to Pleeschegoff. I choose rather to take for granted he has sent you a letter I wrote him about a month ago, in which I said something of the success of the book, than to be at the pains to write it over again. Since then it has had some little sale in Ireland, and, I hope, may do something towards preventing the success of the measure of reducing the rate of interest there; a measure which, after having been thrown out of the House of Lords there this winter, is to be brought on by administration the next, it is said.

"Since my arrival in England, I have of course been very idle, doing very little to Code, and of course feeling like a fish out of water the whole time; but, by God's assistance, I have found out a country lodging which promises to suit me very well, and I shall migrate to it before the week is out. It is at a farmhouse at Hendon, eight miles only from town. The man rents £150 a-year, and £50 of it of Mr. Brown; and his wife has the reputation of a good cook, having lived in that capacity with a good family. It is decently furnished with tapestry hangings, large carpets, and immense tables. The great inconvenience is terrible low ceilings. I shall live on the Zadobras plan, saving and excepting fleas, gnats, mice, dirt, and interruptions. It is a very pleasant country, and being all in grass, the delights of hay-making will continue five or six weeks. The Q. S. P.'s took me down, when I saw and agreed for it, and they spontaneously promised that I should not meet with any disturbance from them so long as I stayed there. I have now upon trial at my lodgings (for my chambers were let during my absence, and I am in no great hurry to get back to them.)

a superb harpsichord of Merlin's, which I think to buy and send into the country. It has four strings to every note, viz. besides two unisons, the octave above and octave below, and a set of hammers to produce the effect of a pianoforte. The tone is a very sweet one; but the inconvenience is, that the complexity renders it proportionably liable to be out of order, and diminishes the loudness. It is an elegant piece of furniture, very beautifully inlaid. I can have it for sixty guineas. I shall buy it, and then immediately I shall regret that I did not buy instead of it a simple grand pianoforte, the tone of which would be louder, and is to be had for the same money. The harpsichord was made in 1781, and cost then one hundred or one hundred and ten guineas. I have got a present from Anderson of a good stock of orange marmalade, with a receipt for making it. I shall set up a marmalade fabrique when needful, and shall then be very happy to have the honour of your company at Hendon, at the old hour, after you have dined at Crichef.

"As soon as I have finished such parts of Code as cannot be published, one without the other, I go to Paris to get it corrected, and advise about the printing of it.

"I met Randal t'other day in the street, who stopt me to inquire after you. Charles was telling me of his having met Shairp, I forget where. S. made very particular inquiries after me, desired his compliments to me, and added, that if he had known before of my arrival he would have waited on me."

A letter of Lord Lansdowne of 16th June, 1788, is a confession of that tedium vite which spares not the most elevated of our race:—

"DEAR MR. BENTHAM,—I solemnly assure you that it has been not only on my mind, but upon my heart, to find out this Parson's house at Hendon, and to pay my court to you, not to thank you for your magnificent present of not only a most magnificent but very useful map in the present situation, because I know your nature makes you above accepting acknowledgments, but to tell you how much we wish to see you at Bowood. I am so tired of the whole human race, that we propose to bury ourselves for some time; but as, happily, all desires return after a certain abstinence, you will find me very happy to make peace with my fellow creatures through you, and to begin my return to society in London by profiting of yours for some time in the country. I need not say anything for the ladies. Though I am just now tired to death, and quite asleep, I must tell you the news of the day; which is, that Prussia, Sweden, and Denmark have made an alliance against Russia, and are, at least Sweden, immediately proceeding to action: you know the consequences of all this better than I do. The accounts from France are wonderfully serious. Sanguine people imagine a civil war must ensue. I cannot myself imagine that any other consequence can be expected than a more speedy assemblage of the States, and a better constitution of the Cour Plénière, or Habeas Corpus, restricted to particular descriptions and bodies. Lord Wycombe sets out to-morrow, and goes with me as far as Bowood. He sleeps only one night at Bowood, and sails in the Packet, on Sunday, for Lisbon. This affects me, as you know: but things must go their natural course.

"I am most truly yours,

(Signed)

"P.S.—You must not be surprised if my news turns out to have no foundation, for I have it from no authority. I will take care of your letter and instructions about it for Lord W."

LITERARY REGISTER.

The Genuine Remains of Ossian. Literally translated; with a Preliminary Dissertation: By Patrick Macgregor, A.M. Published under the Patronage of the Highland Society of London. Smith, Elder, & Co.

THIRTY years since, the publication of this goodly volume would have been a great event in Scottish literary history; and one which might have created not a little controversy. It is not impossible that such may still be the case; the authenticity of Ossian's Poems being one of those questions on which men are privileged to be disputations and angry.

He would be a hardy sceptic who, in the face of an array of evidence of all sorts, would venture to affirm that a vast quantity of indigenous poetry, of an original and very remarkable kind, had not been found, during the last half of the eighteenth century, in the remote Highlands and in the Isles of Scotland; which poetry could not compose itself, and which, if not the production of Ossian, must have been composed by some one, long before James Macpherson was born. The present translator has undoubting faith in the Ossianic Remains; but no faith whatever in Macpherson's honesty, nor respect for his knowledge of the Gaelic language;—of the language of the Gaelic poetry, or what we have heard natives describe as "the deep Gaelic," which few of themselves, though using their vernacular tongue for all the ordinary purposes of life, comprehend. Mr. Macgregor neither doubts the authenticity, nor yet the extreme antiquity of the poems—"relics preserved by oral tradition for fifteen centuries;" but he is surprised that no Gaelic scholar has hitherto given a less faulty English version than that of Macpherson of the Genuine Remains of Ossian; for he rejects many pieces for which this claim is asserted. Macpherson, he says, omits or adds whole lines, and alters at pleasure; and he affirms that those compound epithets, such as, darkly-rolling, mildly-blushing, feast of shells, days of other years, &c., for which, probably from early association, we entertain considerable tenderness, are never found in the Gaelic. According to him, Macpherson combined all the worst qualities of a translator: ignorance of the idiom, dishonesty, and prejudice. These are questions which can perhaps only be fairly settled by competent Gaelic scholars. Macpherson's translation being considered so faulty and vicious, Mr. Macgregor conceived that justice to the bard, and to those who relish his works—and they, we suspect, are more numerous than the critics will like to allow—demanded a new translation. That which he has accomplished is line for line with the original; and literal so far as the phrase may be applied to any translation from such a language as the Gaelic. Of his work he modestly says—"For its faults, I hope I may claim some indulgence, on account of the difficulty of rendering closely into intelligible English, poems remarkable for their idiomatic and concise style, and composed in an obsolete dialect, whose poetic vocabulary is extremely copious. I was obliged, in several instances, to render three or four Gaelic terms by the same expression. . . .

I did not consider it any part of my business to alter or modify such expressions as may appear harsh, flat, or strange. The translation is as literal as a regard to perspicuity, and the idiom of the English language, would possibly allow."

A well-written preliminary dissertation gives the history of the discovery of the poems, and states the evidences of their authenticity. It also gives a view of the controversy between the learned Goths and the patriotic Gaels, in which the writer answers anew the leading objections of the chief Goths. The Gaelic poems in the collection of Dr. Smith he considers not genuine—though of some of them he has also given a literal translation—deeming the translations of Smith as faulty as Macpherson's in point of fidelity, and destitute of the poetic merits of Macpherson's. These translations are confined to the Appendix.

The translations from Macpherson's collection of Ossian's Poems are six Dwans (or what we call cantos, chapters, or books) of Fingal; eight of Timora; three of Ca-Lodin; and eight shorter poems.

To give our readers an idea of the new translation, of which we are quite incompetent to judge, we copy out the celebrated Address to the Sun, which they may compare with that of Macpherson.

"O thou that travellest on high!
Round as my fathers' iron shield,
Whence proceed thy cheering beams!
Thy lasting light, O Sun!
Thou comest forth in beauteous night—
The stars conceal from us their paths;
The moon withdraws, pale-orbed, from heaven,
And hides her under western waves.
Thou art alone in thy journey;
Who can attend thy course?
The mountain oaks will fall;
The hills and rocks consume with age;
The ocean ebbs and flows;
The moon is lost on high;
Thou alone dost always triumph,
Exulting in thine undiminished light.
When tempests darken round the world,
With thunder hoarse and lightning dire,
Thou lookest tranquil on the strife,
And smilest midst the elemental war.
But vain to me is all thy light:
I shall see thy countenance no more;
Or when thou spreadest thy golden locks
On the face of the clouds in the east;
Or when thou tremblest in the west,

At thy dusky gates on the main.
But thou, perchance, art like myself—
Now strong, in course of time to fade—
Our years alike going down to gloom,
Hastening rapid to their close.
Do thou therefore rejoice,
O Sun! while in thy strength of youth:
Dark, unpleasant is old age,
Like the light of the waning moon
When she looks on the fields from clouds—
Hoar mist upon the mountain's side,
The wayfarer tired and slow.

We might multiply such well-known and favourite passages; but those who would profitably pursue the subject must take book in hand, and compare for themselves. In the same way we must leave the Dissertation; in which the author makes many palpable hits, particularly at Laing, who sometimes erred by proving too much, as well as by the trivial, captious, or simply ridiculous nature of his objections, in many of the alleged coincidences which he has fancifully traced.

Duncan's History of Guernsey. 8vo, pp. 656.
Longman & Co.

This is a large book to be written about so small a country; but it is a very complete work; for the little independent "self-contained" state of Guernsey contains every element of the widest empire. In writing this history, Mr. Duncan has had most valuable assistance from gentlemen the best qualified by birth, connexion, education, and residence, to co-operate in this undertaking. It is, in fact, a kind of joint-stock concern, or Cyclopædia of Guernsey. One reverend gentleman contributes the chapter on Ecclesiastical Architecture, a highly interesting one; a medical man, that on Climate; another, the chapter on Antiquities; another, that on the Constitution of the Island; another, the observations on its Horticulture and Meteorology; several intelligent individuals, in short, combining to form a more complete and satisfactory work than any single individual, however gifted, could have produced. Mr. Duncan has been for a considerable time a resident in Guernsey; and in the historical researches, which is solely his own department, the gentlemen of the island seem to have lent him ready and useful assistance.

The first, and by far the longest chapter, written by Mr. Duncan, comprehends the Political History of the Island from the tenth century, when it was ceded to Rollo by the King of France, until the beginning of the reign of Victoria. From its position, Guernsey has had a stirring and eventful history. The second chapter, also written by Mr. Duncan, treats of the Commercial History of the Island; which, from its peculiar privileges, is of no little interest, and particularly during the late long war, when Guernsey, from the blockade of the continent, was suddenly enriched by the carrying trade, and by smuggling, and privateering.

With the agriculture of Guernsey and the singular nature of land tenures, our readers have already been made acquainted by Mr. Duncan through this Magazine.* To this interesting feature we shall not therefore refer.

Within the last sixty years, or since the American war, Guernsey seems to have undergone more alteration, and to have made a more rapid social progress, than in three or four previous centuries. Among the ameliorating influences have been the Wesleyan Methodists, who appeared in the Channel Islands soon after the rise of the sect, and made good their footing. The sudden influx of wealth from commercial causes was a yet more powerful agent; and even when this prosperity was checked by the peace of 1815, the spirit of improvement did not decay. Steam navigation has had its own share in the gradual and latterly sudden change. Since 1824, steamers have plied between Southampton, London, St. Malo, &c., and the Channel Islands; and they now sail with as much regularity as between London and Hull. The Island is now supplied with fuel, by coal brought from the north of England by its own vessels. While Steam Navigation is doing so much for Guernsey, it is, at the same time, from the facility of transmitting all kinds of provisions to a dear market, rendering it every year less desirable as a residence for strangers with limited incomes. There the half-pay officer, or the small annuitant, will no longer find himself much better off than in the neighbourhood of London, or any other large city, and without their many advantages.

All the volume is agreeable and instructive reading; but the chapter on Agriculture ought to be studied with earnest attention by every one who has any influence in public affairs. It runs in the teeth of nearly all the commonly received doctrines of Political Economy in relation to Agriculture; but if the proof of the pudding be the eating, look to Guernsey and to other countries.

This, though not Mr. Duncan's first work, is his most elaborate production. It is highly creditable to his judgment, intelligence, and industry.

Æsop's Fables, written in Chinese. By the learned Mun Mooy Seen Shang; and compiled in their present form, with a Free and a Literal Translation, by his pupil, Sloth. Printed at the Canton Press Office.

Such is in part, the quaint title of a thin quarto volume, done up orientally, in a brilliant yellow Chinese wrapper, powdered with gold, and altogether one of the most singular literary productions that has fallen under our notice during our critical career. The author is Mr. Robert Thom, a native of Scotland, who has gained considerable reputation as a Chinese scholar, and celebrity as an interpreter. He is now one of the regularly appointed assistant-interpreters: and has, during the late hubbub, been made honourable mention of in different official despatches. He is the translator of the Chinese tale of the "Lasting Resentment of Miss Keon Leean Wang." Mr. Thom, with the assistance of Mun Mooy Seen Shang, his Chinese teacher at Canton, having first had the Fables turned into Chinese, rendered them back again into English. Though named Æsop's Fables, they are in fact a selection of all the best fables of antiquity. Mr. Thom related them orally in Mandarin Chinese to his teacher, who wrote them down in the simple and easy style which, indeed, from their new English dress, may be inferred; the style which Mr. Thom describes as the easiest and *lowest known in Chinese compositions. He says that, "by making himself master of this style the student will find little difficulty in understanding the various season-shwee, or popular novels of the day; and it may serve as a stepping-stone to much higher literary acquirements." These Fables are, therefore, to be considered as an important elementary book to the student in the acquirement of the most difficult language that is known; though one which is every day becoming of more importance to England. The books of the ancient Chinese sages ought to point to very remarkable events to the Celestial Empire, in the latter part of this century; in which the "red-haired barbarians" are conspicuously to figure. The attention of the Government has latterly been aroused on this subject, and a Chinese professorship has at length been established in London. The language will now be studied at home; and here is a good preliminary book. The printing of the work was smuggled at Canton; and in its pages Chinese wooden blocks and European metal types, for the first time, stand amicably side by side, emblematic, we trust, of much future good to literature, and to the people of Asia and of Europe. Prefixed to the Fables is an ingenious dissertation upon the Chinese language, which gives a more intelligible account of it than any that we know.

The Fables are printed with three columns on each page. The first column contains the English, translated in a free and in a literal manner from the Chinese; the middle column looks grand in the Chinese characters; and in the third are the words expressed by these characters printed in European letters. We give a specimen. The Fable is the Wolf and the Lamb. The first is the free translation.

When Pwan Koo† first began, all the birds and beasts could speak. One day a wolf with a sheep at the same stream was drinking water; the wolf wished to devour the sheep; but reflecting within himself (he found) he had nothing to serve as an excuse, so he constrainedly upbraided him, saying, "You make muddy this water, causing me (old fellow) that I can't drink. I ought to kill you." The sheep to him—"Your majesty is at the upper part of the stream, and I, the sheep, am at the lower part of the stream; although muddy, it is no obstacle." The wolf again reprimanded him, saying, "You, last year, on such a day, uttered language that gave me offence. I also ought to kill you for this." The sheep said, "Your majesty is mistaken! Last year, on such a day, I (the sheep) had not yet appeared in this world—how could I offend your majesty?" The wolf then, his shame changing to anger, rebuked him, saying, "Your father or mother having offended me is also your crime!" So he devoured him. The proverb saith, "If you wish to impute crime to a man, why feel anxiety about not having an excuse?" Then this fable is just saying so.

LITERAL TRANSLATION.

Pwan Koo beginning, birds beasts all can speak. One day wolf with sheep same stream drink water. Wolf wished devour the sheep, himself thinking, not whereby take-up excuse; so, forcibly upbraided him, saying, "You disturb muddy this water; cause, old fellow, not even drink, ought kill. Sheep opposite said, "Great king is upper stream; sheep am lower stream; although muddy no obstacle." Wolf again reprimanded, "You gone-year such day, went-out words obtained crime with me also; ought kill." Sheep said, "Great-king error: such a day sheep not go-out-world; how could obtain crime? Great-king wolf, then changed shame, made anger; rebuked him, saying, "You p. p. father mother obtained crime with me; also your p. p. crime!"—forthwith devoured him. Proverb says "Wish add him crime, what distress not excuse then this p. p. saying also!"

* We apprehend that lowest must not here be understood in the vulgar sense. The style or language of the narrative parts of the Old Testament makes it the easiest English book, in point of style, whether to a foreigner or to a native; but we should not for this call it the lowest.

† Pwan Koo is among the Chinese a fabulous monster, or the first man or human being who appeared after the heavens and earth were divided. He is represented as clothed in a kind of apron of leaves, and holds in one hand the sun and in the other the moon.

Of this singular compilation, Mr. Davies, a gentleman thoroughly qualified to judge of its merits and utility, has, we understand, said, "These fables are a surprising proof of what may be done in the Chinese language; and it was a happy idea to choose a subject so universally intelligible and entertaining." The compilation has also been highly commended by the celebrated Chinese scholar M. Julien, who has said, that were the work known and procurable, no Chinese student in Europe would be without it.

Edinburgh as a Place of Education. Part I.

The author of this publication imagines that agencies are at work which are tending rapidly to convert "the city of Edinburgh into the greatest existing emporium of education;" nor is there a doubt that this city possesses many advantages as a place of education, which he has not yet enumerated. The portion of the work that is finished refers entirely to the University. An epitome of its history, and a description of its scheme and usages are given. But the most important part of the little work is the account of the College Societies; those private clubs, if we may use the word, instituted by the Students themselves, for mutual improvement. These are certainly a most important feature of the Edinburgh University; and if not wholly peculiar to it, they have been carried to a much greater extent than in any other University. Some of these societies are of long standing; but the greater number are of comparatively recent organization; and all of them have of late years received new life and movement. These College Societies, though still as independent in operation as they are distinct in object, have been conjoined, under the general name of the Associated Societies of the University; and form, in fact, a University within the University: that of the Students within that of the Professors. As we conceive this an object of public interest we shall cite the account of those Student scientific, philosophical, and literary clubs.

The associated societies of the University of Edinburgh afford a striking example of this fact. They are now by no means ordinary debating societies; several of them were so originally; all of them still retain inducements to call forth display,—mingled, however, with a tendency to ulterior ends, which attaches an importance to them, in an educational point of view, and even adds some educational efficiency to the University with which they are connected. Although not made a part of the Edinburgh University school by the wisdom of design, these associated institutions are beginning to impart a very deep and exciting interest to its literary, philosophical, legal, and medical studies: and if the support of the students of the four faculties be given them in the same degree as it is deserved, there can be little doubt but one great distinguishing and characteristic excellence of the College will be fully in time, as it is partly at present, attributable to these societies. One of the most eminent of the medical Professors declared it to be his opinion, that there was more doing for the advancement of professional knowledge in the societies than perhaps in the classes themselves. Certain it is, that the tuition of the classroom is very evaporative, but, at the same time, capable of being lastingly impressed by extraneous aid, without which it very often deteriorates, and sometimes entirely decays. The education of words and names does not always lead to, far less comprehend, the education of things. There is also a precarious blank somewhere about or between the end of the collegiate and the dawn, or at least the fair setting in, of actual business life,—an ominous gap, through which much that is really excellent in the acquirements of the former period is apt to evade adaptation to the purposes of the latter. Notwithstanding the growing utilitarianism of education, the system evidently remains incomplete until some more assured means are devised for impressing, improving, and perpetuating what it communicates, than the mere parting injunction of the teacher to the taught. In this point of view it seems fortunate for the University of Edinburgh, that on the erection of the new University buildings, a suite of apartments was, through the influence of some discerning individuals, assigned to a class of institutions, for the most part indeed previously subsisting, but obviously destined, under the fostering protection of Alma Mater, not only to supply such a desideratum as we have mentioned, but also to simplify and assist the course of instruction within the University, and constitute a constant test of its efficiency by sifting the acquirements of the students.

The association of literary and scientific societies meeting in the University was formed in 1833—the original five bodies composing the association, being the Scots Law, the Plinian, the Hunterian Medical, the Dialectic, and Diagnostic Societies. Of these, within a short time afterwards, the Plinian Society, though still in existence, and having a small museum of natural history and other property in the hall, dropped, in a measure, out of the association. Its place was successively supplied by the Ethical Society, now in abeyance, and latterly by the Cuvierian Natural History Society. There being still a vacant evening in each week, the privilege of the hall was, subsequent to the association of the societies, obtained by the Royal Physical Society, now associated with the others, although taking no part in their annual general discussions. During session there is therefore a constant succession of meetings, to which the public are admissible, in the Societies' Hall within the College; some societies also holding summer sessions when agreed to by certain proportions of their members. The Scots Law Society assembles on the evening of Monday, the Royal Physical on that of Tuesday, the Hunterian Medical on that of Wednesday, the Diagnostic on that of Thursday, the Cuvierian on that of Friday, (but for the most part fortnightly,) and the Dialectic on that of Saturday. The Debating Hall is appropriately furnished and decorated, and by special permission lighted with gas, as are the adjoining waiting-rooms, lobbies, &c., containing the museums, libraries, and "properties" of the various societies. The surveillance of the societies has been intrusted by the honourable patrons (the Magistrates and Town Council of the city) to Mr. Gordon the Secretary of the University. The Janitor of the College, Mr. Barrowman, is nightly in waiting for taking charge of the apartments and managing the lights, fires, &c. which he must extinguish precisely at twelve o'clock, receiving for this and for cleaning the apartments separate salaries from each society. The association is governed by a council of twelve delegates, two being annually sent up to represent each society.

The grand exhibition day of the Associated Societies is held about the time that the Session is closed, and is made an occasion of considerable display. The aggregate meeting has of late years been held in the most fashionable public rooms of the city, and ladies have been admitted. The questions debated are consequently of a general and popular character. We have not made up our minds on the uses of this grand finale; but if the Students like it, and if it keep some of them in union with the Societies, who, save for this display, might remain indifferent to the real objects of these associations, there is much to be said for the popular annual exhibition.

The list of these College Societies, and their evenings of meeting, is given. These are—on Monday, SCOTS LAW SOCIETY.

Tuesday—ROYAL PHYSICAL SOCIETY, begun in 1771.

Wednesday—HUNTERIAN MEDICAL, begun in 1834.

Thursday—THE DIAGNOSTIC SOCIETY, begun in 1816.

Friday—THE CUVIERIAN NATURAL HISTORY SOCIETY, begun in 1833.

Saturday—THE DIALECTIC SOCIETY, begun in 1787.

Some of these societies have libraries, and others museums. The expense to each member is very moderate. Members of any society appear to be admissible, as spectators, to all the societies; so that for a payment of less than a guinea a-year, a student has open to him, on every evening of the week, a place of resort at once safe and improving, or immediately connected with his studies. Some of the societies give prizes, which are open to general competition. There are several other societies connected with the University, but of a less popular kind, as the celebrated Speculative Society—the Wernesian, and others.

Edinburgh, as a place of education, is a wide field. The subject comprehends the education of both the sexes, and should begin at the A B C.

Illustrations of Arts and Manufactures. By Arthur Aiken, F.L.S., &c.

Mr. Aiken was the Secretary to the London Society for the Encouragement of Arts, Manufactures, and Commerce. About a dozen years ago it was proposed to the Society of Arts, to appropriate a few evenings to the illustration of British Arts and Manufactures. Papers were read by several members, and above forty were furnished by the Secretary. A selection from these forms the present volume. The papers have been carefully revised, and a few needful and some ornamental illustrations are given with them. The subjects are varied and interesting. The first paper is a somewhat copious history of Pottery, from the bricks of Egypt to the modern ware of Staffordshire and Worcester. The volume furnishes much instructive and curious reading for young persons. We shall illustrate its nature by a few extracts of a popular kind; but it is all popular, even where most original. This first is from a paper on "Gypsum and its Uses."

There are two other modes of obtaining casts which when carefully and skillfully practised are eminently successful, and therefore require a short notice.

The first of these was invented by Mr. Deeble, for which he obtained a medal from the Society of Arts. His object was to obtain casts of leaves with all their natural and beautiful undulations for the use of the painter or architect. For this purpose the newly gathered leaf, before it becomes flaccid, is to be laid with its face upwards in a natural position on a bed of fine grained moist sand; and then by means of a broad camel's hair brush is to be covered over with a thin coating of wax and Burgundy pitch rendered fluid by a gentle heat. The leaf is now removed from the sand and dipped in cold water, which hardens the wax and allows the leaf to be ripped from it without injuring the impression. This being done the wax mould is to be placed in sand and banked up as the leaf was: it is then covered with thin plaster laid on with a brush and forced into all the interstices of the mould; more plaster is then poured on, and, when it sets, the warmth produced is enough to render the wax pliable, which with a little dexterity may be rolled up, parting completely from the cast.

The second method was invented by Mr. Fox of Derby, for which he received the medal of the Society. The object of this gentleman was to form an elastic mould of only two pieces capable of delivering undercut surfaces. The body on which the mould is to be formed, being previously oiled, is to be suspended about an inch above the bottom of a box or any other convenient vessel: warm melted glue mixed with a little treacle, and made as thick as possible provided it will run, is to be poured in so as completely to cover the body to be moulded. The glue when cold is to be divided by a sharp knife or in any other convenient way into two parts, and the nucleus or body will without difficulty part from this elastic mould, however tubercular and irregular the surface may be. The two pieces of the mould being oiled are to be bound together with tape, and the cavity being filled in the usual way with plaster affords a perfect cast, as proved by the specimens deposited by Mr. Fox in the Society's museum.

It would be a mere waste of words to demonstrate formally the advantages of plaster-casting. By the artist, by the amateur, by the man of science, and in common life, it is perpetually called into use. The best thing next to having originals, is to have accurate copies of them; and from all solid substances of moderate bulk we obtain copies by casting, far more perfect than the pencil of the artist is capable of delineating; for by one we obtain a fac-simile, and by the other only a representation in a single position, with this additional advantage on the part of the former, that we are able to multiply copies of it cheaply, expeditiously, and mechanically.

Bone Manure.—Bones have always been used as one of the ingredients of that multifarious mixture of offal of all kinds—a dunghill; but it is only of late years that their extraordinary value as a manure has been fully ascertained. About forty years ago an acquaintance of mine was cultivating a small estate of his own, and from not having been originally brought up to farming was the more ready to try novel experiments. A pack of hounds was kept in his neighbourhood; and this furnished him with an opportunity of obtaining, at small cost, the bones of the old horses and other animals that were slaughtered for food to the dogs. He invented, or got made for him, a machine for crushing the bones; and then spread them as a top-dressing on a grass field, the soil of which was a sour red clay that produced nothing but dyer's broom, and the other weeds that usually grow on such soil, along with the coarsest grasses. The effect produced by the bones was strikingly evident in the next spring: the dyer's broom and other weeds had mostly disappeared, and were succeeded by a close undergrowth of clover and fine grasses. The animal matter of the bones no doubt contributed much to this striking amelioration; but the earth of the bones, especially the phosphate of lime, also bore its share in it. Many of our limestones are little else than a congeries of the organic remains of corals and other animals; and the late Professor Turner detected the presence of phosphate of lime in the Saurian remains that abound in the lias limestone. Many of the corallines, as I have already stated, contain as much phosphate of lime as the bones of mammalia do: it is probable therefore that in the coralline limestones also phosphate of lime might be found if it was specially searched for; and to the presence of this, if authenticated, may perhaps be attributed some of the effects on vegetation which agricultural chemists are in the habit of accounting for by the action of caustic lime or of its carbonate.

I do not know if bones are valued as a manure in any part of the continent of Europe; but it is certain that of late years they have attracted, in a very particular degree, the attention of the English farmer. Bones are collected in the streets of London and other great towns, and after being sorted, those that are not required for other purposes are used as manure. In the Thames above London Bridge, may almost always be seen a few sloops and cutters, chiefly from Hull, which are occupied in this trade. They take the bones on board generally in a more or less putrid state, and stow them in bulk in the hold: here they soon begin to ferment, giving out an odour by which the bone-ships are detected at a considerable distance; and when the cargo is discharged at Hull, it is frequently reeking and smoking hot from decomposition. This probably softens the texture of the bones, and renders them more easy to be crushed in the mill, through which they are passed previous to disposing of them to the farmers. They are employed chiefly in two ways, either as a top-dressing to grass land, or are drilled with turnip-seed, the plants from which, under the stimulating effect of this powerful manure, quickly pass through their first stage into the rough leaf, and thus in a great measure avoid the attacks of the fly and other insects by which young turnip-plants of tardy growth are often entirely cut off. Our native supply of bones is not at present sufficient to answer the large and increasing demand for them for agricultural use; and bones are now imported from South America and other parts. It is even said that some of the celebrated battle-fields of our own time have furnished considerable supplies of this now valuable commodity.

Translation of Faust. By Lewis Filmore.

This new translation, making at least the twentieth, has been done "expressly" for Smith's Standard Library. The object of the translator, as stated in his preface, is to place in the hands of the public at large, at a cheap rate, as faithful and literal a transcript of Goethe's great work as is compatible with the difference of the languages, and the difficulties of verse and metre. Mr. Filmore appears to have executed his task with spirit and delicacy. That our readers may judge for themselves, we cite two brief specimens in different styles—one from the Garden Scene—the other Faust's Soliloquy.

Marg. Yes! out of sight is ever out of mind!

To you so easy is this courtesy,
And you can friends in such abundance find,
All too, so much more sensible than I.

Faust. Believe me, love, what men call sensible,
Full oft deserveth not its title well,
And we should better far the thing express
As vanity and narrow-mindedness!

Marg. How so?

Faust. Alas! that thus simplicity
And innocence should never know or see
Their own all-holy worth! that humble thought,
Best gift of bounteous nature—blessing-fraught—

Marg. Well! for a moment sometimes think of me!
I shall have time enough to think of thee.

Faust. You're much alone, then!

Marg. Yes! our house—'tis true—
Is small, but still must be attended to;
We have no maid, all on me lies,—

I sweep, cook, sew, up soon and late;
My mother, too, is so precise,
In everything so accurate!

Not that she is obliged to be Confined in all so sparingly;
We might do more than many do,—

My father left us, of our own,
A little house and garden, too,

A pretty place beside the town.

However, now the days with me

Pass over pretty peacefully.

My brother 's for a soldier gone,

And my poor little sister 's dead,—

Much trouble with her have I known,

Yet all the anxious sorrow sped,

Mine joyfully again should be,

So dear the infant was to me!

Faust. She were an angel, were she like to thee!

Marg. She loved me—oh! so fondly! I

Had brought her up entirely;

After my father's death 'twas born,

My mother too had nearly died,—

All hope, indeed, we had foregone,

Her sickness was so sore to bide;

So sad the state in which she lay,

So slow her bettering day by day,

That she herself could never think,

Of suckling it, poor little thing!

And so I nursed it—gave't its drink,

Its milk and tender nourishing!

And brought it up, thus all alone,

Till it became, as 'twere, mine own;

Within my arm and bosom, on my knee,

It grew and sprawl'd, and laugh'd so prettily!

Faust. The purest of all joys 'twas thine to share

Marg. But yet with many anxious hours of care.

All night the infant's cradle stood

Beside my bed,—nor ever could

I move, but it would waken'd be;—

Now I must rise and give it food,

Then take it into bed with me!

Then, when it would not rest, must rise and go,

Dancing it in the chamber to and fro,

And still must rise at early day,

To stand beside the washing tray.

Then to the market go—to see

For all our home's necessity;

And thus from day to day, the same

To do whene'er the morrow came.

When 'mid such things as this one lives,

The spirits are not always good;

But, then, 'tis true, the labour gives

A relish both to rest and food.

Faust. You knew me then, sweet angel, for the same,
The moment I into the garden came!

Marg. Did you not see it! When 'twas you I found,
My eyes directly fell upon the ground.

Faust. And thou forgivest that freedom, then, from me,

That proffer of my impudence to thee?

As thou wert leaving the cathedral door?

Marg. I was abash'd, for I had certainly

Ne'er met with aught resembling it before.

None aught of evil of me e'er could say;

Ah! (thought I) did thy conduct then betray

Aught bold or unbecoming in a maid!

He seem'd to say, "I need not be afraid,

Or stand on many compliments with her."

I own I know not what began to stir

In your behalf within my heart—but I

Felt with myself, I know, right angrily:

Because I could not bring myself to be

More vex'd and angry than I was with thee.

Faust. My dear one!

Marg. For a moment stay.

[She picks a Starflower, and picks the leaves from it and after another.

Faust. What would 'st! Is't for a peep?

Marg. Nay.

'Tis but a game!

Faust. How so?

Marg. Away!

You'll laugh at me.

[She plucks off the leaves, and murmurs to herself.

Faust. What are you murmuring!

Marg. He loves me—he loves me not—

Faust. Thou heavenly thing!

Marg. (continues.) He loves me—he loves me not—he loves me—no!

He loves—he loves me!

Faust. True, my child, and let

This floweret-promise be unto thine heart

A voice, a sign from Heaven! He loves thee! Yes;

Dost thou know all the meaning of the words,

He loves!

Marg. I tremble!

Faust. Nay, love! shudder not;

But let this glance—this pressure of the hand—

Tell what is inexpressible by speech.

To give ourselves up wholly to the sense

Of a delight that must eternal be!

Eternal! oh! its end would be despair!

No! no! no end.

[MARGARET presses his hands, then from herself from his embrace and runs away. He stands for an instant thoughtful, then follows her.

Marg. (coming up.) Night comes apace!

Meph. Yes! and we will away

Marg. Indeed, I'd ask you longer yet to stay,

But 'tis a wicked and censorious place,—

'Tis just as if they nothing had to do,

But all the neighbourhood's affairs to trace,

Our comings in and goings out to view.

And do however well one will,

One's certain to get talked of still.

And where, then, are our loving pair!

Meph. Flown up the little alley there!

Fond butterflies!

Mar. I think that she Appears to love him.
Meph. Yes; and he Seems fond of her, too, you might say;
'Tis of the world the usual way.

SCENE.—A SUMMER-HOUSE.

MARGARET enters, hides herself behind the door, and putting her finger on her lips, peeps through the crevice.

Marg. He comes.
Faust (entering.) Ah, rogue, and is it so
That you provoke me? I have caught thee now!
[He kisses her.]

Marg. (embracing him and returning his kiss.)
Thou dearest one! I love thee from my heart!
[MEPHISTOPHELES knocks outside.]

Faust (stamping.) Who's there?
Meph. Good friend!
Faust. The Brute!
Meph. 'Tis time to part.

Mar. (comes forward.) Yes, sir, 'tis late.
Faust (to MARGARET.) Might I not go with you?
Marg. I fear my mother would—Oh, no! adieu!
Faust. Must we then part, my love! then I Bid thee farewell; farewell!

Mar. Good bye.
Marg. Till our next speedy interview.
[FAUST and MEPHISTOPHELES ascend.]

Good Heavens! how many things—a man
Like him within his mind can span;
I stand abash'd when he is near,
Or answer, yes, to all I hear!
I'm but a simple child, and cannot see
Or comprehend what he can find in me.

FAUST (alone.)

Faust. Spirit sublime! thou gavest me, gavest me all
For which I pray'd thee. Not in vain hast thou
In fire turn'd to me thy countenance.
Thou gavest me glorious nature for a realm,
With power to feel her and enjoy. The glance
Thou didst permit me, was not that of cold
And distant wondering; thou didst not forbid
My gaze to search into her deepest breast
As 'twere the bosom of a friend. For thou Hast pass'd before mine eyes, the linked chain
Of all the things that live; and it is thou
That teachest me to know, as kindred things
Unto myself, the still and silent wood,
The water, and the air. And when the storm
Roars through the forest, when the giant pine,
O'erthrown, bears crashing on the neighbour boughs,
And stems that nigh it grow, in sweeping fall;
When, with dull muttering echo, to the shock
The mountain thunders,—then thou bearest me
Unto the shelter'd cave, there showing me
What mine own nature is; mysterious then
And deep the marvels that unfold themselves
In mine own breast. Then rises to my view
The clear calm moon, that with her softening ray Soothes all things as she soars. Then sweep around
From rocky walls, from dew-damp bush and shade,
The silver-shadow'd forms of ages past,
That gently mingle with the pleasures stern
Of thought austere and contemplation deep.

Oh! that to man naught perfect ever falls
Now feel I most; with this delight that brings Me nearer and nearer to a god—thou gavest
Unto me this companion, whom e'en now
I cannot spare, though cold and insolent
He to myself degradeth me—and turns
Thy gifts to nothing with a breath. He wakes
For ever in my soul a raging fire
For that so lovely form—and thus I reel
From fierce desire into enjoyment, and E'en in enjoyment languish for desire!

A well-written preface; and numerous illustrative notes give additional value to a translation intended for the many, and worthy of the few.

Whistle-Binkie, Third Series.

Many of the Scottish minstrels have contributed to this new series: some of them bearing names to us till now unheard, yet possessed of no mean measure of the faculty of song. Amidst the constellation of songsters, we find Gilfillan, Captain Charles Gray, Vedder, James Ballantine, Sandy Rodger, who is editor, Alexander Laing, Andrew Park, William Thom, James Murray, Alexander MacLaggan, who has lately published a meritorious volume of Scottish poems, and many others. We find the name, William Miller, attached to some songs, rich in grotesque fancy. One of these, and a sweet little song by James Ballantine, must form our specimen of the collection. A few of the most choice songs, we may say in commendation of the new series, have previously appeared in this Magazine.

Wee Willie Winkie rins through the town,
Up stairs an' down stairs in his nicht-gown,
Tirlin' at the window, crying at the lock,
"Are the weans in their bed, for it's now ten o'clock?"

"Hey Willie Winkie, are ye comin' ben?
The cat's singin' grey thrums to the sleepin' hen,
The dog's speldert on the floor, and disna gie a cheep,
But here's a waukrife laddie that winna fa' asleep."

Anything but sleep you rogue, glow'ring like the moon,
Rattlin in an ain jug wi' an ain spoon,
Rumblin', tumblin' roun' about, crawlin' like a cock,
Skirlin like a kenna-what, waukenin asleepin' fock.

"Hey Willie Winkie, the wean's in a creel,
Wamblin' aff a bodie's knee like a verra eel,
Ruggin' at the cat's lug and raveling a' her thrums—
Hey Willie Winkie—see, there he comes."

Wearit is the mither that has a stoorie wean,
A wee stumple, stooseie, that canna rin his lane,
That has a battle aye wi' sleep afore he'll close an e'e—
But a kiss frae aff his rosy lips, gies strength anew to me.

The song, Willie Winkie, will form a good ditty for Scottish nurseries.

WIFIE, COME HAME. By James Ballantine.

Wife, come hame,
My coothie wee dame;
O but ye're far awa,
Wife, come hame.

Come wi' the young bloom o' morn on thy brow,
Come wi' the lown star o' luve in thine e'e;
Come wi' the red cherries ripe on thy mou,
A' furred wi' balm like the dew on the lea.
Come wi' the gowd tassels fringing thy hair,
Come wi' thy rose cheeks a' dimpled wi' glee;
Come wi' thy wee step and wife-like air,
O quickly come an' shed blessings on me.

Wife, come hame,
My coothie wee dame;
O my heart wearies sair,
Wife, come hame.

Come wi' our luve-pledge, our dear little dawtie,
Clustering my neck round, and clambering my knee,
Come let me nestle and press the wee pettie,
Gazing on ilka sweet feature o' thee.
O! but the house is a cauld hame without ye,
Lanely and eerie's the life that I dree;
O come awa and I'll dance round about ye,
Ye're ne'er again win frae my arms till I dee.

Wife, come hame,
My coothie wee dame;
O but ye're far awa,
Wife, come hame.

Parley's Wonders of Art, Ancient and Modern.

Here is yet another Lilliputian quarto, by the infatigable Peter; and a very instructive and pleasing one.
The illustrations are, as is usual in this Series, faithful and beautiful.

On the Sufficiency of the Parochial System without a Poor Rate for the right Management of the Poor.

By Thomas Chalmers, D.D., &c. &c.

We notice the publication of this volume, because it may be imagined a mere reprint, while in fact it is in a great measure a new work, in which Dr. Chalmers sets himself afresh to demolish every advocate for ameliorating the condition of the poor, by any means save his peculiar system, or by his panacea. One especial purpose of the Doctor's book is, to expose what he conceives the erroneous opinions of Dr. Alison. As we cannot help thinking that Dr. Alison knows a great deal of the actual condition of the poor, and of the true nature of the remedies which the pauperism of Scotland demand, we shall probably return to this work, which has appeared too late in the month for longer examination. We can guess, before-hand, that it will be vastly popular with the Lairds, and with a great majority of the established clergy. Dr. Alison appears to have piqued the other worthy Doctor's sense of infallibility more than any other antagonist that he has yet encountered.

The English Maiden.

Here is a little book, with a happy title; which, according to some reports, is in modern publication half the battle. The work is a preachment to young women, containing many safe and good truisms. The author or compiler has drawn freely on Mrs. Ellis, Mrs. Sandford, and the most celebrated modern writers upon the duties and destinies of the sex.

The Child's Book of Facts. Edited by the Rev. T. Wilson.

This is a Book of Questions and Answers on a plan now familiar to everybody. It embodies many facts, and will prove useful; though we cannot help thinking that all these manuals are as convenient to the lazy teacher as agreeable to the little scholar.

Tales of the Moor. By Josias Homely.

The moor is, we presume, meant to be Dartmoor. Josias Homely alias John Bradford, a Devonshire man, has put together a volume of prose and verse of fair average merit, for which the Devonshire nobility and gentry have subscribed handsomely. Nearly two-thirds of the volume is devoted to a novelette entitled the "Wine Merchant of the West," which is really very pleasant reading.

The Hand-book of Grammar for English, German, French, and Italian Students, showing at one view the construction peculiar to each language.

We merely direct the attention of teachers to this comparative grammar, without giving any opinion on its merits as to execution. The idea seems good; and if a plan, announced lately by one of the masters of our High School, of teaching several languages together, along with Latin, has been found practicable, or to work well, here is a most useful compilation in furtherance of its object. The comparative grammar, or the grammar of four languages in one book, must have cost the compiler a vast deal of pains. He seems to have consulted the best authorities extant. The work carries in its side-pocket, tabular views of the conjugation of verbs in the different languages, and such other matters as could not be compressed into an ordinary-sized page; as the pronouns, auxiliary verbs, &c. &c.

The Hand Book of Berwick and the Vicinity.

This small topographical work was composed for the use of the visitors to the Highland Society's Cattle Show, which was this season held at Berwick. It originally appeared in the Berwick Warrier newspaper. It contains a great deal of antiquarian and miscellaneous information, and forms an intelligent guide to that part of the Border Land.

FORBES'S EAST INDIA AND COLONIAL GUIDE.—A useful little book, and not an expensive if a somewhat brief guide.

THE PATRICIAN'S DAUGHTER: A Tragedy in Five Acts. By T. Westland Marston.—This tragedy is an experiment of how far the democratic spirit of the age is adapted to dramatic purposes. The experiment is not conclusive.

SERIAL WORKS.

PARTS II. and III.—SELBY'S HISTORY OF BRITISH FOREST TREES.—This work increases in interest. The trees described in the late parts, are, however general favourites, which may be one cause of attraction. They are, among others, the Elm, in its many varieties; the White Thorn, the Wild Cherry or Gean tree, and the Mountain Ash, which three species are raised to the deserved dignity of forest trees; a distinction to which they are entitled by the value of their timber, as well as by the beauty or picturesqueness of their forms. We have also the Ash and the Walnut. The illustrations are of great beauty; whether portraits of the trees described, or appropriate embellishments as tail-pieces.

MRS. ELLIS'S FAMILY SECRETS, from PART IV. to PART VIII.—These Stories which are in fact Tectotal or Temperance Tales for the Middle and Upper Classes, do not fall off in interest. One of them told in Bedlam during a lucid interval, by an unfortunate lady, the victim of intemperance, into which she had been betrayed by using brandy too freely when taken as medicine, is of deep tragic interest.

FISHER'S SCOTT'S ILLUSTRATED BIBLE. DIVISION II.—This portion of a work which requires no particular description, time having stamped its sterling character, reaches to the Book of I. Kings. It is well printed, the Notes in particular, being in a clear and beautiful type. The illustrations comprise several fine landscapes and views of cities and villages in Syria and the Holy Land.

Nos. I. and II.—AN APPEAL to the ANTIQUARIES OF EUROPE, on the DESTRUCTION of the MONUMENTS of EGYPT. By George R. Gliddon, late United States Consul at Cairo.—This Work contains a great deal of curious and valuable matter.

PART I.—THE STEAM-BOAT; A TALE of the THAMES and the TIMES: By G. W. M. Reynolds.—This is a work in the style of the Pickwicks, and other Serial Tales. There are some good engravings of the kind in which the matter-of-fact unimaginative genius of the time delights. The story is, once again, rich cits made ridiculous by their admiration of fashion.

PART XXXVII.—KNIGHT'S PICTORIAL SHAKESPEARE.—This elegant series is drawing to a close. The present part consists of Poems; Venus and Adonis leading the way.

PART XXIII.—TYAS'S ILLUSTRATED SHAKESPEARE, ROMEO and JULIET.

PART II.—DIBDIN'S SONGS, with the MUSIC of the most POPULAR SONGS.

PART I. and II.—LECTURES ON CHEMISTRY. By Henry M. Noad.

PART VI.—THORNTON'S HISTORY OF BRITISH INDIA.

PAMPHLETS.

A REVIEW of the late PROPOSED MEASURE for the REDUCTION of the DUTIES on SUGAR. By Joseph Beldam, Esq.—The author of this pamphlet, which is addressed to Sir T. Fowell Buxton, has for forty years been an active abolitionist and fellow-labourer with Dr. Lushington, Sir Thomas Buxton, and all who have been the most distinguished by ability and zeal in the Abolition cause. For the first time he differs with his friends, and with the majority of the society. He considers the plan proposed by the late Government for the sugar-duties, as a step in advance towards the universal abolition of slavery, which can never be effected until it is found to be for the interest of those concerned. He considers the competition of free labour as the only sure means of bringing about the desired end, and that this is impossible while the existing monopolies are maintained. The reasoning is close and cogent. No fair view can be given of the argument unless it is followed at length. We shall, however, cull a passage here and there. Whatever Government we may have, this question is not likely to be lost sight of: it has got hold of the country.

It is manifest that if a cheaper and more effective mode than slave labour can be obtained in sufficient quantity, slave labour must, upon the economic principle, be discontinued.

But in order to accomplish this object, the superiority of the substituted labour must be ascertained—not merely by way of example, but as the result of competition by the actual production of a cheaper article. It is the successful competition of free with slave labour, in the market of the world, that alone can practically decide its superiority. Anything short of this must fail. An example may be disputed. A complete parity of circumstances, even in the same locality, can scarcely exist, and may be easily denied. Exceptions of particular interests may always be quoted. But if free-grown produce were introduced in sufficient quantity into the markets of Europe, at a cheaper price than the produce of slave labour, the fate of slavery and the slave trade would be instantly sealed.

Now this theory takes for granted the superiority of free labour, including in that term those scientific and economical arrangements which a slave agency can never so effectually employ.

But I need not attempt to prove a superiority, of which the abstract truth is universally admitted.

Mr. Macaulay very decidedly held that "Competition" is the real cure for slavery and the slave trade: and Mr. Cropper constantly affirmed that "slave labour must fail, in competition with free labour." May I not add your own valuable testimony, to that of a host of individuals who have asserted the same important truth?

Directly in the way of competition, stands a great commercial monopoly—monopoly is the antagonist principle to competition—they cannot flourish together—and what is good for the one must be injurious to the other. If competition between free and slave labour be required for the extinction of the slave trade, then must monopoly be exchanged for a less exclusive principle.

Up to a very late period the West Indies possessed the monopoly of the Home Market—a monopoly originally created for the ostensible purpose of supplying cheaper produce; not pretending at that time to be for the encouragement of free labour, which it actually discouraged in the East Indies; but openly avowing itself to be for the protection of British West India produce against the produce of all other countries.

This monopoly, after many struggles, and much remonstrance, of precisely the same kind as that urged against the late proposed measure, was ultimately divided with the East Indies.

The wretched condition of West Indian agriculture was plainly perceived by them to be a consequence, not only of slavery, but of various other causes, ranging under the head of monopoly; which were accordingly deprecated and deplored. The colonial system of cultivation was designated by Mr. Wilberforce, adopting the powerful language of Lord Brougham, a "gaming agricultural speculation." Mr. Clarkson, when contending for the superiority of "free over slave labour," and inveighing against monopoly as excluding competition, further objects to it as tending only to keep up "an unprofitable" system. Mr. Stephen ridicules the idea of a monopoly for the protection of a system of agriculture which rejected the plough, the harrow, and the wain, and employed a far greater number of labourers than is necessary; and he complains that "the interests of the empire are sacrificed to colonial influence." The writings of Mr. Macaulay and Mr. Cropper abound with similar sentiments.

The Measure proposed by the late Ministry and the Objections to it are next considered; the only substantial objections being the seeming encouragement given to slavery, and that we are not at liberty "to do evil that good may come." Of this it is remarked, not that we largely take slave produce of other kinds, but simply

This is true, but as actions are to be judged of by their aggregate tendencies, they must be accounted good or evil, as the one or the other quality preponderates. To decide upon this balance, in fact, constitutes a great part of the moral arithmetic of life.

If this doctrine be untrue, how can we pretend to justify any mode of competition whatever between free and slave labour, seeing that until the preference is decided in favour of free labour, a considerable increase of the slave trade probably, and a great aggravation of slavery certainly, will follow?

Against such a preliminary objection, therefore, the proper defence of the proposed measure rests on its necessity for the attainment of a paramount advantage, and may be thus stated:—A full development of the energies of free labour is essential to the entire extinction of the slave trade and slavery; but this development can only be obtained by a bona fide competition with slave labour. The existence of a monopoly is incompatible with this kind of competition. Therefore the monopoly ought to cease. I am aware that these are propositions which remain to be proved; I am now only stating them.

Dr. Lushington asserts that our own colonies will soon produce an abundant supply; and admitting this, Mr. Beldam contends that it makes for his argument. Though there may be next year an increased supply of from sixty to seventy thousand tons, he pertinently remarks—

But if there be little danger for the future, so far as British produce is concerned, there seems to be less from the prospects of the slave-holding States. There can be no doubt that these States expected a far greater diminution of sugar in the British Colonies as the result of emancipation, than has actually occurred. Mr. Burnley tells us, our ruin was confidently anticipated by them, and they made provision accordingly. Perhaps also they made a still greater mistake in calculating our powers of compensation in the East. This appears to me satisfactorily to account for a portion of that vast increase in the slave trade of late years, stated by yourself, and corroborated by various official authorities. I say a portion only, for there are other causes which must go on augmenting until slave-grown sugar is superseded by free. It accounts likewise for a glut of slave produce, and for a corresponding reduction in its price, which I observe within the same period, as set down in the government table: and which, so far as it goes, tends to discourage rather than to stimulate slave labour. But I speak with extreme diffidence on these purely commercial questions.

The present state of our Colonies, therefore, so far from furnishing matter for exultation and renewed hope to the slave States, must rather produce disappointment, and render them less likely to incur great additional expense with diminishing probabilities of profit.

Then, again, there is good reason to believe that our own Colonies, considered as a whole, have reached their lowest point of depression, and that if the most effectual means are taken to develop their resources,—means hereafter to be considered, and now assumed to be encouraged by the proposed measure,—their prosperity will rapidly advance; each succeeding year lessening the probability of importation.

These means are various; but the main agent is to give that impulse to bond fide competition, which must lead to other improvements; to a system of resident tenantry, and to all sorts of agricultural improvements. Our space forbids us following the subject, which is very fully discussed, and not as a commercial but as a great moral question, though it is necessarily viewed in all its bearings. The writer sets out with affirming, that “the proposed measure is substantially in accordance with Anti-Slavery principles, and is peculiarly calculated to bring them into efficient operation;” and he goes far to establish his impression. We quote a part of the conclusion of the argument. It embraces the question on the widest basis.

Can we forget, again, that the slave trade now affords the only remaining pretext for the existence of monopoly, and consequently that it really gives to the monopolists an interest in the continuation of the trade, to the same amount as the value of the monopoly itself—that is to say, to the amount of some millions per annum! And with our attention but just withdrawn from the conduct of British capitalists in Brazil and Cuba, can we pretend to say that this circumstance may not seasonably create a considerable degree of alarm!

It would be endless, however, to expose the mischiefs of this subtle and dangerous antagonist. But there is one point of view, in which it is to be regarded with peculiar apprehension at the present moment; and that is, in its pretended alliance with a disinterested and generous cause.

The remark of Lord Palmerston was both just and emphatic, that the hopes of universal emancipation centre in this highly-favoured country. If anything could discourage those hopes by alienating a compassionate people from its advocates and friends, it would assuredly be a general belief in this unnatural coalition [of Abolitionists, and Planters.] Such a belief, however ill-founded, could scarcely fail to prove fatal to it.

I will venture to affirm that all the true friends of the African race would indignantly repudiate such an idea. It is no idle boast to assert of them as a body that they have proved themselves, by all constitutional means, to be the determined enemies of injustice and oppression in every form. And by their acts of splendid liberality, not less than by the most self-denying labours on behalf of a suffering country, their consistent and general charity has been fully established. Even in the favourite field of their exertions, they have never lost sight of the incalculable benefits which would certainly accrue from their efforts abroad to the industry, skill, and enterprise of their countrymen at home. Yet I must be permitted to think that the position recently assumed by a large proportion of this disinterested and patriotic body in opposition to the late measure, was neither a safe nor a judicious one,—not judicious, because it was almost necessarily exposed to much misrepresentation, and unsafe, because, as I believe, it was not in principle the true one.

It is impossible to overlook the immense influence acquired of late by the religious and philanthropic classes over every question of great public interest, or to doubt of the benefits the country may derive from its discreet exercise: yet so long as party spirit, political intrigue, and selfish designs employ their usual vigilance in appropriating to their own use every new moral and social power, it cannot be needless to caution those who have enjoyed so large a portion of favour against the artifices of a multitude of pretenders, who in critical times abuse their name, and endanger their well-earned authority with the public.

Dr. Lushington has been taunted with affirming that the British people would spurn the alleviation of their own misery by increasing the horrors of slavery. He can have no wish to retract such an opinion, but he will readily admit, that the occasion for such an act of self-denial should be placed beyond suspicion. He must not wonder at the hesitation that has been recently manifested between the claims of humanity and an abhorrent principle; nor blame a disposition rather to entrust the interests of freedom to its own energies than to the protection of its natural enemy.

Whenever a great and urgent necessity is made plain to their understanding, the people will be ready to fulfil all that has been promised for them. But they may fairly insist on the condition, that this necessity shall be distinctly proved; and while they wait for more certain evidence, they may confidently point to the sacrifices they have already made, as an imperishable memorial—standing out prominent and alone—of their genuine and extraordinary regard for the claims of justice and humanity.

At present the case is not so obvious, and they have good reason to doubt the necessity. They have been told, and they believe, that the energies of freedom are able to defeat those of slavery, if they be fairly tried; but that competition is essential in order to secure the victory. Competition appears to have been offered on equitable terms, and in accordance with a principle, the general truth of which is admitted by all. A reasonable protection has been offered in lieu of a prohibitory duty, which, with a doubtful operation on the interests of humanity elsewhere, produces certain injury to the general interests of the country.

Lord Sandon has admitted that the present protection is more than is required. Mr. Burnley, of Trinidad, has declared that if free labour can be procured, this fertile and important island requires little or no protection at all. British Guiana is a still larger colony,—equally fertile,—and even more favourably situated than Trinidad for competition with slave labour on moderate terms. Antigua already raises by free labour double her former produce, and can well spare a prohibitory duty. St. Kitt's, and Dominica are making rapid advances in the same direction. The general prospects of the West India colonies, for the ensuing year, are said to be unusually promising, and the East Indies present the prospect of abundant supplies, in aid of those which our colonies are expected to afford. In short, the objection to this measure centres in Jamaica. I should be truly sorry to disturb the spirit of conciliation, which I believe to be essential to the cause of freedom in that colony, as in all others. Yet when Jamaica is quoted as a principal obstacle to a measure so apparently reasonable, there must be many persons who will call to mind, that from the same source has emanated an almost uniform opposition to previous measures of amelioration and improvement: and they will remark, with some concern, in how extraordinary a manner within the last few years the destinies of the empire have been made to bend to the particular convenience of that interesting but discontented colony.

I beg again to observe, that in discussing the principle of this important measure, I have abstained from entering upon those purely financial and commercial views, which I believe would have furnished me with abundant materials in confirmation of my views. My object has been to consider the subject solely in its relation to Slavery and the Slave Trade.

In attempting this task, I have constantly borne in mind the latest advice of my friend Mr. Macaulay, that I should “never on any account consent to sacrifice a step once gained;” but I have coupled with it, a sentiment which I know to have been equally important in his estimation, namely, the necessity of taking a comprehensive view of the whole subject, in order to secure a safe conclusion. I value these sentiments equally,—and am quite conscious of my inability to do full justice to them. I therefore rejoice in the recollection that the practical decision of this important question has rested in abler hands.

Yet, after employing the best means in my possession, at the present moment, of forming a right judgment, I can perceive nothing of a retrograde movement in the character of the proposed measure.

If I err, there are not wanting those who will avert the mischief, and who may condescend to correct my mistake. In the meantime I must be contented to retain my conviction, in the company of some living authorities,—and also, as I believe, with the sanction of several of those estimable and devoted men who are gone before us; whose real opinions I have endeavoured correctly to ascertain, and whose pre-eminent example, I should think it sufficient praise, usefully though humbly, to follow.

AMERICA and the CORN-LAWS, or FACTS and EVIDENCE. By John Curtis of Ohio, United States. This is the gentleman who lately did good service to the people of Great Britain by his lucid statements at the great Manchester convention of ministers and others. In the pamphlet those statements are amplified, and many new facts are brought forward. We give one brief extract, wishing that we could transfer the entire pamphlet to our pages—

The following data will enable the reader to judge of the probable price at which American wheat can be sold at Liverpool:—

Wheat can be collected in any desired quantity at Chicago, at the south end of Lake Michigan, in the heart of the wheat region, at 27s. per quarter. A comparatively small amount might be gathered in abundant years at 23s.

The present charges for freight from the places mentioned to New York, on the New York route, are as under:—

Places.	Miles from New York.	Flour per barrel.	Flour equal to qr. wheat.	Wheat per quarter.
		s. d.	s. d.	s. d.
Chicago, . .	1450	6 0	9 10	12 0
Detroit, . .	800	5 1	8 4	10 0
Cleveland, .	680	4 6	7 5	9 3
Buffalo, . .	530	4 1	6 8	8 4
Albany, . .	160	0 7	0 11	1 2

The transportation is carried on by companies which are responsible for all loss or damage. Flour in barrels must always, from its compactness, lightness, and ease of transhipment, be the preferable form of exportation, especially from the more distant parts. Any discriminating duty on flour would have the effect of raising the price of American wheat in the British market proportionally. The following was the rate of freight and charges on flour to Liverpool in the month of January, 1840:—

	Flour equal to 1 qr. of wheat.
Warehouse charges in New York, . .	0 4
Freight to Liverpool,	5 0
Bond, dock, and town dues,	0 5
Primage,	0 3
Coopersage, weighing, delivery, &c., .	0 9
Commission and del credere ,	1 7
Insurance,	0 4
Add risk of damage and loss of weight,	1 6

The cost of American flour in Liverpool, according to this date, without reckoning interest or profits, would be from 26s. to 28s. 6d. per barrel, or reckoning a barrel at 38 gallons of wheat, from 43s. to 47s. per quarter.

America will not produce great quantities of wheat at less than the first cost above stated, as that country affords abundant means of producing an equal return for labour in other employments. These prices will remunerate the grower at the present rate of wages in America; and at such prices on the immense plains of the west, competition will always insure production to any amount which a regular market may demand; but while the present fluctuating prices occasioned by the corn law continue, the distance of the United States will prevent any large amount reaching the English market from that country. The uncertainty of the trade will effectually discourage both production and transhipment, although the average price may be greater than that at which they would furnish it if free. To America the present British corn law is more unfavourable than actual prohibition.

Certain English writers on the subject of supply have referred to the small quantity of grain imported from America for a few years past, as a proof that little could be expected in future from that quarter under a system of free trade. It is certainly a singular method of reasoning, that makes a trade in corn, embarrassed by laws which in effect amount nearly to prohibition, the measure by which to calculate the amount a free and regular exchange trade could furnish!

The high prices which prevailed in America in the years 1836, 1837, and 1838, have also been cited, in certain high quarters, in proof that England cannot safely calculate upon a regular supply from across the Atlantic. It fortunately happens, however, that the history of the rise of price of that period, if fairly told, leads to no such conclusion.

That history we cannot pursue in detail. In substance it is shown, that the rush of agricultural emigrants to the new El Dorado, the fertile regions of the Far West, (see page 747,) have suspended cultivation, and temporarily occasioned a scanty supply of wheat for exportation, soon to be increased to an incalculable extent.

THE LETTERS OF DIOGENES TO SIR ROBERT PEEL.—Those letters, which have appeared in the columns of the Morning Chronicle during the past summer, are here collected in a thin volume, inscribed to the members of the Anti-Corn Law Societies. The Letters are ushered into public notice as a book, by an able preface, in which Diogenes does not spare Sir Robert Peel. Diogenes has no faith whatever, either in the statesmanship or the candour of the Premier, who more charitable persons are willing to believe will do right—when he must. An appendix to the Letters contains eighty-three pithy clauses or notes, meant to serve as a syllabus for the use of Anti-Corn Law Lecturers. Diogenes is opposed to all restrictions; to any duty, no matter how low. In the preface he states, in reference to the Sliding Scale, “Modifications of this absurd system will no doubt be proposed by many a state quack, and perhaps meet the support of some well-meaning and sensible men. In proportion as they will approximate the corn trade to a state of perfect freedom, or a low fixed duty, objections to them will diminish; but so would also the pretext for their necessity. Until it shall have been boldly proclaimed by the Legislature, that all such restraints are absurd, there will remain something rotten in our commercial policy; when that principle shall have been generally admitted, this silly contrivance will not trouble us much longer.”

LETTER FROM SIR FREDERICK TRENCH TO VISCOUNT DUNCANNON, FIRST COMMISSIONER OF WOODS AND FORESTS.—This letter enunciates a splendid scheme of improvement in London; and one which appears quite practicable, so far as we can understand the matter. The scheme is not new, and the late changes in the metropolis have rendered it both more necessary and more easy of accomplishment.

It is the formation of an embankment, on the north side of the Thames, from London Bridge to Hungerford Market. Thus Sir Frederick announces his plan—

The Emperor of Russia lamented that the finest river in Europe should be condemned to be a Cloaca Maxima; and complained, that after a fortnight's residence in London, he had not obtained a sight of the Thames, of which he had heard so much. The plan I now propose will bring its grandeur and beauty into daily and hourly observation; and no one will deny, that a railroad, running from London Bridge to Hungerford Market, (which may be passed over in four minutes,) will be a great accommodation to the public; and I think that such a colonnade as I now propose to you, affording a walk of one mile and three quarters in length, and sheltered from sun and rain, will be a feature of utility and magnificence not to be equalled in any capital in Europe. Your Lordship has already expressed your conviction of the great importance of the plan I submitted to your consideration when it first occurred to me—and if I can prove that it will not only pay its own expenses, but the expenses of erecting the whole of the embankment suggested by Mr. Walker, as well as the railroad and carriage road and promenade, which I now propose, and leave a very large surplus for its embellishment and for other objects, I am confident that such a plan will receive all the assistance and encouragement which your official situation enables you to give it.

Lord Duncannon has retired to the shades; but his Tory successor is surely not likely to be more opposed to a plan so every way desirable, that it were a thousand pities if it cannot be accomplished. The embankment completed, Sir Frederick contemplates farther improvements, which must both embellish and ceinture the capital. He would open to the river the beautiful portico and front of St. Paul's, opposite to Paul's Chain, and form a street to the river, terminated by a fountain and jet d'eau, with a double flight of steps to the water. His plan would also open a view of the Temple Gardens. It is illustrated by lithographed views. When Sir Frederick asserts, that as "to expense there can be no doubt," we imagine he has obviated every difficulty; for no one can question the utility and beauty of his plan.

CAVEATS FOR CORN-FIELDS, comprehending a MORSEL FOR MINISTERS. By Selden Junior.—A well-meaning pamphlet by a far-behind-the-age Tory; who is Pro-Corn-Law and Anti-Poor-Law; who has much kindness of heart, and, like "gentle dulness," loves a gentle joke.

APPEAL TO HER MAJESTY QUEEN VICTORIA, PRAYING FOR REDRESS. By Thomas Say, late Lieutenant in the Bombay Native Infantry.—This gentleman describes himself as the victim of an oppressive superior officer, Lieutenant-colonel Gilbert. Against the sentence by which, what he terms, gross injustice was consummated, he has in vain appealed to the Civil Courts—which have no jurisdiction in such cases; to the Board of Directors of the East India Company, who have paid no attention to his complaints; and failing all, to the Queen, who, through the Home Secretary, has declined interference. But, as he cannot take this as Her Majesty's personal act, he now publishes his appeal, that he may be sure it is brought under her notice, and at least under that of the public. This much we conceive it a duty to state, though unable, in the absence of evidence, to give any opinion of a case which, on the face of it, appears one of those countless ones of individual hardship, and even ruin, for which there is no redress.

AN APPEAL IN BEHALF OF THE PEASANTRY OF THE BORDER. By W. S. Gilly, D.D., Vicar of Norham, and

Canon of Durham.—The subject of this well-meant pamphlet is contained in a motto on the title-page,—“Give them good cottages, and help them to educate themselves.” The peasantry require a great deal to be done for them; or rather to be enabled to do a great deal more for themselves than is pointed at here, though all is unobjectionable so far as it goes.

FINE ARTS.

PICTURESQUE SKETCHES IN SCOTLAND, &c. PARTS III. and IV.—As may be said of many things under the sun, these lithographic plates, are the finest when the subject is good. This style of engraving is peculiarly adapted to architectural subjects. The views of the Canongate Tolbooth of Edinburgh; the Cathedral of Glasgow, and the Chapel of St. John, Prince's Street, Edinburgh, are agreeable sketches, and give a fair idea of the objects represented. The view of Arran is very inferior. Indeed, this style of art must ever fail where aerial perspectives, and atmospheric effects are to be conveyed.

ENGRAVINGS AFTER THE BEST PICTURES OF THE GREAT MASTERS. PART III.—The subjects of this new Part are, 1st, Raphael's Paul Preaching at Athens; which is by many persons esteemed the finest of the Cartoons. It is engraved in the line manner, by THOMAS DICK; and is certainly one of the best plates of the series, both in point of clear and forcible expression and in delicacy of finish. The second plate is that rich and exquisite composition of Claude Lorraine, which has been fancifully christened Eneas landing in Italy. It is engraved by WILLIAM RICHARDSON, in a more massive style than is common in the present day, and makes, if a somewhat black, yet an effective picture. The miniature figures, we presume by the same artist, are wonderfully well done. The third plate, forming the ninth of the series, is RUBENS' Conversion of St. Paul. It is engraved by HENRY HAIG, and is truly a splendid transcript of a great painting, as remarkable for minor faults of execution as for artistic power. These faults probably become the more conspicuous from the limited size of the plate.

NICHOL'S CITIES AND TOWNS OF SCOTLAND ILLUSTRATED: Part III.—Glasgow is the city to which the new Part of this pictorial work is devoted. Few British cities afford a greater number of fine views, whether purely architectural or scenic. Excellent use has been made of this affluence of picturesque subjects; and fifteen plates, all of them fine, and some of them splendid, do justice to the Western capital. There is a plan of the city given along with this Part, which will be a highly popular one. The views of Glasgow from the Clyde—The Broomielaw, the Cathedral, and Barony Church; a plate containing four views in the Quadrangle of the College, and another in the High Street, are worthy of especial notice. In the latter the costume is admirable. So it is in four views, interiors, may we call them, of closets.

POLITICAL REGISTER.

PARLIAMENT was prorogued on the 7th October to the 11th November; but there is no probability of its meeting till the beginning of February. The Royal Speech, delivered by commission, was more than usually inane. It contained no allusion to any measures to be proposed in next Session: but what surprised us, after the attempts on the part of the Duke of Wellington and Sir Robert Peel to make out that little distress existed in the country, her Majesty was made "to repeat the expression of her deep concern at the distress which has prevailed for a considerable period in some of the manufacturing districts." The hundreds of petitions and addresses to the Queen, not to prorogue Parliament till the cause of the distress was investigated, have, as a matter of course, been disregarded; and the people may, for anything the Aristocracy care, die of starvation, while the Ministers are maturing, as they allege, measures for their relief. The Duke of Wellington is sure that if there be any distress, it cannot arise from want of food; and he asserts that every industrious man in Britain has it in his power to earn a competency. Such a declaration, made at a time when bread is 2½d. a pound, and the wages of a great part of the working classes are under 12s. a week, is downright mockery, and will, in all probability, produce a similar effect as his eulogy on the perfection of the House of Commons in 1830. Notwithstanding the silence of the Ministry on the policy of the Government, enough has been elicited to show that the Poor Law, which has formed for years so fertile a subject to the Tory press and hustings-orators for declamation against the Whigs, is to be retained in its full integrity. There are also symptoms of an intention to clobber a little the existing Corn Laws; but the Sliding Scale will certainly be retained. In the Address from the throne, Parliament is told that it will be expedient early next Session to take into consideration measures "for the purpose of equalising the public income and the annual expenditure; and we may readily conjecture that, under a Tory Government, this means nothing else, but that taxation is to be increased. What the additional taxation is to be laid on, has not in all probability been yet considered; but the remarkable falling off of £7000 in the Post-Office revenue in the quarter ending 10th October, 1841, contrasted with that ending 10th October, 1840, is an unlucky event, by giving a handle for asserting that the new system has failed on trial.

THE CONTINENT.—An insurrection for the purpose of restoring Queen Christina to the Regency, has broken out in Spain. O'Donnell took possession of the citadel of Pampeluna on the 2d October. The town was still held by General Ribeiro, but the movement appears to be spreading rapidly over the north of Spain. Bilboa has declared for Queen Christina, and the governor of Santona and the cavalry at Sebastian have followed the example. The conduct of Louis Philippe is regarded with alarm. He has harboured the Queen in one of the royal palaces; and General O'Donnell left France for Spain well supplied with money. The French army and navy are kept up in great force, and the French press ridicules the notion of a country like France being regulated in arming or disarming by the example of other powers. Fears are entertained that first an insidious, and afterwards an open attack, is meditated by France against Spain. In France a very uneasy feeling prevails; but no more outbreaks nor contests with the military have taken place. All the continental states are, like Britain, contracting debt in one shape or another, and all the ruling powers throughout Europe are engaged in devising measures for checking the increase of the democratic power: a vain attempt, which must necessarily fail, and which the incurring of debt is the surest means to accelerate.

AMERICA.—The trial of M'Leod was to commence on the 27th of September. It excites much anxiety, as, in the event of his being convicted, a war between Great Britain and the United States seems inevitable. Even should he be acquitted, it is far from certain that war will not take place. The Tory press is beginning to call out for redress for the past, and security for the future, and loudly asserts that the acquittal of M'Leod is neither the one nor the other. Besides, the Boundary Question remains in as unsettled a state as ever, and each country is fully convinced that it is in the right. The Governor-general of Canada died at Kingston on the 19th September. The immediate cause was lock-law, produced by a fall from his horse. The Canadian Legislature was prorogued the same day. One of the attempts of the House of Assembly is worthy of notice. It was an attempt to prevent the inhabitants of Lower Canada from importing grain from the United States, and thus compel them to purchase Upper Canadian wheat, of a worse quality, at a higher price. The arguments were much the same as those used by our own corn monopolists; but this iniquitous attempt to starve the Canadians was signally defeated. Numerous desertions take place from the troops of the line. The principal employment of the Canadian militia is to prevent these desertions. In the event of a war with the States, desertions in whole companies are anticipated.

CHINA.—The Opium War continues to be carried on in a very unsatisfactory manner. Fighting and negotiating are resorted to alternately, and what is gained by the former is, as usual with the British, lost by the latter. After the last hostilities, it was resolved to make a movement on Amoy; but it having been discovered that, as might have been expected, the Chinese were employing the time so inconsiderately granted them by Captain Elliot in concentrating large bodies of troops in Canton, and in extending the fortifications, it was resolved to abandon the expedition to Amoy, and resume hostile operations against Canton. Fighting commenced on the 21st May, and was continued till the 26th, and everything was then prepared for taking Canton by assault, when it was announced by Captain Elliot to Sir Hugh Gough, commanding the military forces, much to the surprise and mortification of the latter, that he had entered into terms with the Chinese local authorities, and Sir Hugh was requested to suspend hostilities. The terms were—the payment of six millions of dollars, the evacuation of the town by the troops which had been collected, their removal to a distance exceeding sixty miles, and compensation for the plunder of the factories. On these terms being complied with, the British ships and troops removed to their old quarters, forty miles below Canton. In this manner, an opportunity of punishing the Chinese for their treachery, and giving them a lesson they would not soon forget, has been lost, and the prospect of a termination to the war remains as distant as ever. It is rumoured that Captain Elliot has applied £63,000 of the money in paying his dishonoured bills on the Treasury for opium seized: but it is hardly possible that he could venture on such a step. About 6000 men were engaged on the part of the British, of whom fifteen were killed and one hundred and twelve wounded. Major Beecher, Deputy-Quarter-master-general, died from over-fatigue, the heat being intense; and Sir Humphrey Le Fleming Senhouse, the senior naval officer, died on the 14th June from a fever brought on by his exertions during the attack on Canton. The Chinese loss exceeded 1000 in killed.

JUSTICES OF PEACE SMALL-DEBT COURTS.—These Courts have long been considered, by all who have had any experience of their proceedings, not only as unnecessary, now that Sheriff Small Debt Courts have been established, but an absolute nuisance. It was owing to this feeling that Sir William Rae's attempt to extend the jurisdiction to sums above £5, was, in the year 1838, successfully resisted. In some parts of the country these Courts are less unpopular than in others, but the Justice of Peace Small-Debt Court of Glasgow has long had a bad pre-eminence. In consequence of the representations of that indefatigable law reformer, the Member for Greenock, the late Lord Advocate (Rutherford) caused an inquiry to be made into the administration of the Glasgow Court, by Mr. James Moncrieff, advocate; and his Report has recently been printed by order of the House of Commons. Mr. Moncrieff made a long investigation in the Spring of this year into the complaints, and examined a great number of witnesses adduced by Mr. Wallace. Mr. M. states that he found it generally admitted that much dissatisfaction exists in the public mind, as to the administration of the Court, and that to a greater degree than could be accounted for by the mere disappointment of unsuccessful litigants. It appears that a practice very generally prevails of remitting cases from the Court to the Clerk's Chamber. The Clerk not only investigates accounts, books, and other written evidence, but leads parole evidence, and makes up a judgment to be reported next Court-day for the approval of the Justices. Ten per cent. of the whole cases enrolled are so remitted; and from the great number of decrees in absence, the proportion of contested cases remitted must be very large. In this way, the Justices are the Judges only in name, and the causes are virtually heard and determined in the Clerk's Chamber. In the Sheriff Small-Debt Court remits are confined to cases of accounting, and the proportion is only two per cent. of the total number of cases. Another great cause of complaint is the frequency of arrestments. Although there is no statutory authority whatever for arrestments on the dependence, they are used to a great extent. The authority is a marking on the back of the summons, by the Clerk, for which he charges 1s. There can be little doubt of the illegality of these arrestments, by which costs are greatly increased. In one case the principal sum was 9s. 4d., and the expenses 11s. 8d. Both masters and workmen are annoyed by arrestments of wages; and a case is mentioned where nine arrestments were used against a workman in the hands of his master, attaching wages to the amount of £4, though it was found ultimately that the man owed nothing. In order also to bring cases before the Glasgow Small-Debt Court, instead of the Sheriff Small-Debt Court of the district, arrestments are used at the dwelling-houses of the masters in Glasgow when the works are at a distance of six or eight miles, instead of at the works themselves, where the men are paid and the books are kept. By this proceeding the masters are obliged to bring their books and book-keepers, at great inconvenience, to Glasgow. Instances have occurred of book-keepers having to attend the Court ten or fourteen times on account of the arrestment of a single workman's wages. In order farther to increase the business of the Courts, a discount of from 5 to 20 per cent. is given when a number of claims are taken out, and it appears that people who keep what are called club-houses—where clothes and other goods are furnished to workmen on credit—are allowed to take out their claims for 1s. 1d.—the full fees being 1s. 7d.; thereby giving a direct encouragement to litigation. Another complaint is that, in violation of the Small-Debt Act, professional persons are permitted to plead in the Court, and even the constables of the Court are allowed to act as agents, whereby low and oppressive litigation is encouraged, to the annoyance of the public. There appears to be a very general impression in Glasgow, that improper encouragement is given to pursuers in the Court. All pleas which tend to exclude the action of the pursuer, such as prescription and res judicata, are uniformly, or at least very frequently, repelled. A Mr. Taylor mentioned, that out of 300 cases he had conducted, he had never succeeded but in two instances in getting decree of absolvitor in favour of a defender. In the Sheriff Court, the average of absolvitors is about 10 per cent.; in the Justices' Court, the average is only 4 per cent. Where the pursuer is absent, instead of assailing the defender as contemplated by the statute, a decree dismissing the action only is pronounced. The consequence of this irregularity is, that a new action may be brought at any time; and the hardship is the greater, because the defender is never found entitled to expenses. In order still further to encourage litigation, the provisions in the Tipping Act, and in the Small-Debt Act, excluding actions for any debt or demand for spirituous liquors, are almost always neglected even where pleaded. In the Summary Jurisdiction there is an improper encouragement of written pleadings and proofs. One case is mentioned in which an account of expenses of £10, 12s. 6d. was allowed. Of this sum £3, 3s. 10d. were paid to the clerk. In another case the account amounted to £16.

"In concluding the Report," Mr. Moncrieff remarks, "I may allude to the very general opinion expressed of the absolute intillity of the Court, and of the advantage which would arise either from abolishing the small debt jurisdiction of the justices entirely, or substituting a stipendiary magistrate in their room. In its present operation, it does not appear to me that this Court is of any use or advantage to the community. On the contrary, the Sheriff Small-Debt Court seems to be quite adequate for the decision of all substantial questions of this nature, while that of the Justices appears to attract and perpetuate paltry and fictitious litigation. I have no hesitation in stating it as the result of my inquiry, that the Court does not possess the confidence of the public. On its administration by its officers I may remark, that most of the abuses of which I have spoken have unquestionably a tendency to attract business to the Court, and to increase the emoluments of its officers. No doubt the fact, that the legal assessor of the Court has an interest in the fees paid by the litigants, is of itself calculated to excite public jealousy, and is on this account alone an arrangement of questionable propriety." We entirely concur with the opinion thus expressed. We believe that the Justice of Peace Small-Debt Courts are not merely useless, but that they are an absolute nuisance, and that the sooner they are abolished the better.

THE CORN LAWS.—Admitting that the existing Corn Law was perfectly well adapted to the state of the country, when it was passed in 1828, it is never to be lost sight of, that the population of the United Kingdom is augmenting with a rapidity which adds upwards of 400,000 persons to be fed each year. Since 1828, therefore, the increase has amounted to considerably above five millions, or about one-fifth of the population who were in existence at that time. No one, we believe, will maintain, that during the thirteen years a fifth more had been brought under cultivation, or that by any improvements in agriculture a fifth has been added to the produce of the soil which was previously cultivated. On the contrary, it was established before the committee on agriculture in 1836, that some of the soils which had been cultivated from time immemorial, had been in a great measure abandoned for the purpose of growing grain, it being found impossible to raise it with profit at the low prices for which it had for some time been selling. A circumstance which, of itself, almost proves that little additional land can have been brought into cultivation of late years, is, that the number of families employed in Great Britain in agriculture has positively diminished. In 1821, 978,656 families were so employed; in 1831 only 961,134,—so that, taking five as the average number of a family, 87,610 persons were withdrawn from agriculture during the ten years. There is another fact which proves the necessity of an alteration of the Corn Laws. Notwithstanding the continual agitation in Ireland, that country is in a state of rapid improvement; one symptom of which is, that less wheat is now exported than some years ago, a greater proportion of the population consuming wheat-bread than formerly. Taking the five years 1828–32, we annually imported, on the average, 546,380 quarters of wheat and wheat-flour from Ireland; but in 1839 the quantity had diminished to 90,600 quarters; so that it is not improbable that this source of supply may soon entirely cease. But of an article so extensively cultivated, there is no danger of our not having at all times an abundant supply, if we do not by artificial restrictions prevent it. Besides Germany and Poland, the countries surrounding the Mediterranean and Black Sea, and Canada, it is probable that, in a few years, the United States of America could furnish us with all we require to import; and unless we exchange our cottons, woollens, and other manufactures, for what alone the Americans can give, viz. agricultural produce, there can be no doubt that they will find the means of extending their manufactures so as to supply their own demands, in the same manner as so many of the continental states have done, within the last quarter of a century, through our mismanagement. Of late years the American demand for British iron and iron manufactures, has greatly diminished. It appears from recent information from America, that the six North-Western States, and territories of the Union, Ohio, Illinois, Michigan, Wisconsin, and Iowa, are particularly fitted for the culture of wheat. They contain upwards of one hundred and seventy-eight millions acres of land, chiefly arable. A great proportion is prairie, free from trees, and requires nothing but to be ploughed to yield the most abundant crops of grain. The United Kingdom contains seventy-seven millions of acres, of which only three-fifths are in cultivation. From a want of a steady demand for agricultural produce, it is only of late that these extensive and fertile countries have raised grain more than sufficed for their own consumption. But last year Ohio had one million of quarters of wheat to export, and Michigan also now raises a considerably larger quantity of wheat and pork than can be consumed by its inhabitants. Were there a good steady demand, it is estimated that the produce of all these countries would be doubled or trebled in a very few years. Mr. Shirreff, an East Lothian farmer, who visited the above-mentioned district of the States in 1833, gives us some details of the ease and cheapness with which grain is raised in them. The land costs only 8s. 4d. per acre. It can be fenced for 8s. 6d., and ploughed by contract for other 8s. 6d., so that for 22s. 4d. the farmer has the absolute property of good wheat land, fenced and prepared for the reception of the seed. Mr. Shirreff remarks, that in Illinois (and the same observation applies equally to the other five States and territories we have enumerated) forest land is seldom broken up, the cultivation of the prairie being found much more easy and profitable. After the first ploughing—which, as we have already stated, can be done by contract for 8s. 6d. an acre—the soil becomes friable and easily cultivated. It is common to drop Indian corn into every third furrow of the first ploughing, and the ground is not afterwards operated on until the crop is reaped, when it is sown with wheat and simply harrowed. Thus two important crops are obtained by once ploughing and harrowing. A bushel of Indian corn is sufficient seed for ten acres, and half a bushel of wheat sows one acre. The first crop of Indian corn commonly yields fifty bushels an acre, and the following wheat crop twenty-five bushels. Grass seldom grows after the land has been ploughed, and weeds do not spring for years. There are hardly any rocks or stones to impede the progress of the plough. It is evident that these countries could grow sufficient grain to supply all Europe. As to the average price, it is calculated that it may be purchased at Chicago, situated at the south end of Lake Michigan, in the centre of the wheat region, at, per quarter, £1 7 0 Freight, charges, and profits to New York, in the shape of flour, 0 10 0

Do. do. to Liverpool, 0 10 0

Delivered in Liverpool, at, per quarter, £2 7 0

As long, however, as the sliding scale is kept up, there can be little importation of wheat from the United States, nor from any countries equally distant. Between the despatch of the order and the arrival of the grain in Britain, at least two months must elapse; but with a sliding scale, and the fraudulent operations of the corn speculators to raise or diminish the average, it is impossible at any time to conjecture what the duty will be two months hence; so that the practical result of the present law is to give the Poles and Germans a monopoly of the British market. This is a consideration that has not been sufficiently attended to.

HIGHLAND SOCIETY'S SHOW AT BERWICK.—This show took place on the 30th September, and was the largest ever the Society has had; there being exhibited 962 horses, cattle, sheep and swine. The committee met on the preceding day, and to the number of nearly four hundred dined in a compartment of a large pavilion which had been erected in the Barrack Square. After dinner, a lecture on the connexion of the sciences of Geology and Chemistry was given by Professor Johnston of Durham; and an essay by Mr. Grey of Dilston, on the effects of Gypsum, Nitrate of Soda, and other manures, on soil, was read. Upwards of six thousand persons were present at the show, among whom were the Dukes of Northumberland, Buccleuch, Richmond, and Roxburgh, the Marquis of Tweeddale, the Earls of Courton and Buchan, Lords Osulston, Elcho, Howick, Templemore, and John Scott, &c. After the show, the members of the Society dined in the large pavilion. It was seated for two thousand persons, and every seat was occupied. The Duke of Richmond was chairman, and the Marquis of Tweeddale acted as croupier. In proposing his Grace's health, the Marquis remarked that his noble friend was aware, that "though their interests as agriculturists were more immediately connected with those who laboured on their fields, yet he knew well that they did not purchase one from another, and that their best customers were the manufacturers and persons engaged in commerce." The Duke of Richmond, in returning thanks, said, "I am not one of those who support the agricultural interest alone. Far be it from me to do so. I support the agriculture of the country, because I believe on it is based the happiness of all; but you will allow me to express my hope and earnest wishes for the prosperity of the manufacturing and commercial interests of the country. I think that a landlord has a heavy responsibility; he is bound to do his duty to his tenantry. I find no fault with those who do not agree with me in opinion, but I would sooner cut off my right hand than let a farm by auction. (Enthusiastic cheers, which were prolonged for some minutes.) I have my land valued, and putting confidence in those who value it, I give it to the tenant if he think it worth while to accept a lease on these conditions." (Continued cheers.) Dr. Gilly alluded to the miserable condition of the cottages of the farm-servants. "They did not provide either for cleanliness, comfort, convenience, or decency—(loud cheers)—and he attributed the continual fitting to this cause. He found that, out of 174 hinds in a district, no fewer than 51 fitted in one year; 83 in two years; 145 had disappeared in seven years; and 156 in ten years;—so that, of 174 families in a district, only 18 could have been found there ten years ago." The prizes were nearly equally divided between the Scottish and English exhibitors. The meeting of the Society next year is at Edinburgh.

FARM COTTAGES.—We are glad to observe that the disgraceful condition of the cottages for farm labourers is beginning to attract public attention. They are, throughout Scotland, miserable hovels, dark and ill-aired, and often damp from being under the level of the adjoining ground, and not lathed. They hardly ever consist of more than two small apartments. In one of these the whole family sleep in close box-beds, attached to the wall, and closed in front with sliding-doors of deal, so that it is remarkable that those who sleep in them are not suffocated. The lower classes of the Scotch have, in general, a dislike at fresh air entering into their houses; and the prejudice against it has been increased, if it has not arisen, from the circumstance, that the windows of cottages are generally built into the walls, so that it is impossible to open them. Cows, horses, swine, poultry, very often share a part of the cottage: the effluvia and vermin created by these animals must be unfavourable to health. Even in the best districts, the houses of the peasantry are greatly inferior to the stables. The death of a horse is a serious loss to the owner, but the death of a ploughman is not at all felt by the proprietor of the estate. Mr. London, the conductor of that excellent paper, The Gardener's Gazette, which should be in the hands of every gardener, planter, and florist in the kingdom—in his recent tour in Scotland, says, that many of the cottages are the most miserable ever he observed, being in some parts of the country built of turf, in others of turf and stone; the side walls not above five or six feet high, the covering of thatch without any ceiling, and the chimney a hole in the thatch at the gable end. There is no division of the twelve feet square compartment within, except by the position of the furniture; and this is rarely attempted unless the space enclosed is sixteen or eighteen feet by twelve feet. It is remarkable that the proprietors of the estates on which such cottages stand are not ashamed of them. The subject was brought under the notice of the members of the Highland Society at their late meeting in Berwick, and seemed to attract much attention.

TRADE AND COMMERCE.

It is now upwards of three years since the present depression commenced, and it is annually becoming more severe. In London, the number of bankruptcies in 1838 was 306; in 1840, 466. In Manchester, in the former year, 82; in 1839, 199; in 1840, 204. In England (exclusive of London), the average annual number of bankruptcies, during the last nine years, has been 955, and in the cheap years, 1835 and 1836, the number sunk to 737 and 724, but last year there were 1413. Of 14,000 looms in Bethnal Green, Spitalfields, &c., 3000 are quite out of work, and the remainder are only three-fourths of their time employed. The average earnings are 7s. 6d. a-week each loom, from which 1s. 1½d. is to be deducted for expenses. In Oldham, of ninety-one cotton mills, thirty-three are either entirely stopped or working short time, while last year there were only sixteen mills not fully employed. Though the price of food is double what it was in 1836, wages of all sorts of workmen are from ten to twenty per cent. lower. Since 1837, the relief paid to the casual poor in the township, has rapidly increased from £875 in the whole of 1837, to £2708 in the first nine months of 1841.

It appears, from the Aberdeen Herald, that while the imports into Aberdeen, by British vessels, have little varied during the last seven years, the imports by foreign vessels have increased fourfold. The number of foreign vessels which arrived in 1834 was thirty-one; in 1840, 120; while the number of British vessels arriving, which was ninety at the first period, has continued almost stationary; in 1834, 5221 tons of goods, chiefly British manufactures, were exported to America; in 1835, 6297 tons. Ever since that year, these exports have steadily diminished; and in 1840 the quantity was only 2320 tons. The cause of this depression is obvious. Foreigners build their vessels of untaxed materials, and feed their crews with untaxed food. Aided by the skill of British artisans, their vessels are now nearly equal to British, and they can take much lower freights. The present Corn Laws are also unfavourable to our shipping; for when the duty falls, there is not time to send out ships from Britain. Such ships as are on the spot must be employed, and hence the late great importation of grain has taken place in foreign vessels; and as it is better to take low freights than none at all, these vessels are loading with herrings and other articles, which, under a different Corn Law, would be exported by British ships. The decrease of the trade with America is attributable to the same cause. We could easily obtain from the United States alone four or five millions of quarters of wheat a year; but as we will not take what they have to give, we have forced them to encourage their own manufactures, to the injury of our own trade and commerce. In Dundee and Paisley, no alleviation of the distress has occurred; on the contrary, there have been numerous additional failures within the month. In Leith, owing to the great importation of grain, trade has been very brisk of late: but during the summer everything was dull.

AGRICULTURE.

By the end of September, the fields in the neighbourhood of Edinburgh were almost cleared of their crops, (except Beans,) and the grain has in general been got in in pretty fair condition. Although in the higher parts of the country more than one half of the grain was in the fields on the 2d of October, hardly any damage had been sustained; but rain having begun on the 3d, and continued with very little intermission, and in great quantity for fourteen days, the crop standing out was seriously injured by sprouting, and a great part of it rendered useless. Owing we presume in some measure to the struggle going on for the repeal of the Corn Laws, and the change of Ministry, the reports of the crop are more than usually contradictory. In East Lothian the wheat is very unequal in quality, and in general coarse. Barley yields a fair return, and the quality is tolerably good. Oats are likewise an average crop. Turnips are inferior to the produce of ordinary years, and have been sold at from £8 to £10 per imperial acre; 77 imperial acres at East Barns, were let for £750. Wheat has brought £14, 15s.; Barley, £6, 15s. to £10; and Oats, £6 to £13, per Scotch acre—all sold in the field. Clover has everywhere produced a heavy second crop. On the whole, however, the crop is decidedly under the average. Around Berwick, the Wheat crop in point of quality, is superior to those of the three last years. In the Highlands, nearly the whole crop was cut by the 1st October, and appeared to be an average, but it suffered severely from the heavy rains which shortly afterwards fell. In the eastern part of Fife, the turnips and potatoes are particularly fine. In Lancashire and some parts of Ireland, in the finest looking crops of potatoes, two-thirds are rotten, and the remainder very watery and bad. In England generally, it is the opinion of persons well qualified to judge, that in point of quantity, the wheat crop is four bushels the acre; and in quality five per cent. below the produce of last year. The circumstance that the sudden bringing into the market of 1,900,000 quarters of foreign grain, has not had the effect of lowering prices, seems to show that in the general apprehension, that crop is deficient. It is, however, supposed by some, that without any farther importation, we have a sufficient supply till next harvest; though others think 1,000,000 or 2,000,000 quarters will be required.

The third Falkirk Tryst was held on the 11th and 12th of October. Between 60,000 and 70,000 sheep were exposed, nearly the whole of which were sold the first day. Blackfaced widders brought from 19s. 6d. to 26s. a head; cross bred, 23s. 6d. to 28s.; Cheviot widders, from 28s. to 31s.; Cheviot ewes, from 15s. to 18s.; blackfaced ewes, 9s. to 13s. Cattle also sold at good prices. Two-year old stots, West Highlanders, £6, 8s. to £7, 15s.; three-year old heifers, £12. One lot of Angus-shire brought £15, 10s. The show of horses was small, and few were sold. Prices for workhorses ran from £10 to £20. At the Howden great horse fair, which lasts a fortnight at the end of September, the show was the largest known for a number of years. A great many foreigners were present. Several of the best horses were sold at prices varying from £150 to £200, and some excellent brood mares brought from £60 to £85 each. Many valuable horses were purchased for France and Germany.

TAIT'S EDINBURGH MAGAZINE.

DECEMBER, 1841.

REVIEW OF UNPUBLISHED ANNUALS.

THE TOPAZ, FOR 1842. LONDON: Imperial Quarto.

THE high tone of our current British literature is nowhere so strongly seen, as in those periodical visitants of our drawing-rooms and boudoirs—The Annuals. The Magazines have done, and are doing, much for the national literary glory by their nouvellettes, where diluted wit and exaggerated incident cover whole numbers by an ingenious power of expansion that borders on the marvellous; but Blackwood, Fraser, The Dublin University, and even ourselves, occasionally encumber our columns with articles constructed upon antiquated ideas of the propriety of blending the useful with the agreeable. Into this failing the Annuals never degenerate. Their embossed boards, and gilded edges, enfold no tedious disquisitions on history or political economy, no dull records of foreign travel or commercial enterprise, no prosy rhapsodies on “the common things that round us lie,” and all that forms the vulgar poetry of everyday life. The light, the fantastic, the unnatural, the superhuman, is their province. Anybody or any book may utter plain sense, or natural feeling. They soar above this dim spot of earth, and float in Folly’s car through the airy realms of agreeable nonsense.

We have now before us the gem of the season—THE TOPAZ! It is no common Annual; but the quintessence of all possible Annuals for this or any other year. Such delicious absurdity!—such charming twaddle! Illustrations so exquisitely insipid! Romance so harrowing in its extravagance! Poetry so touching in its inanity! Contributors of such celebrity! Heavens! After we had skimmed it through, we felt as if we had been shut up in our bed-room, and dieted on water-gruel for a month!

Here, for example, is a sweet thing:—

TO IANTHE.

BY LORD VINCENT FLUTINGHAM.

I love thee, fair ladye,
By night and by day,
In sunshine and shadow,
I love thee alway!
’Neath rainbow and tempest,
’Neath beautiful skies,
I think of thy bosom,
I think of thine eyes—

Those mirrors of nature,
That sparkle so blue—
I love thee—I love thee—
Fair ladye, I do.

I love thee, fair ladye,
Too well to express;
May none ever love thee,
Or worship thee less!
My castle’s deserted,
And lonely its wall,
My hawk’s on the mountain,
My steed in the stall.
My heart is the warder,
That watches for you—
I love thee—I love thee—
Fair ladye, I do!

There is only one fault about this, and it is this: We have read much the same sort of thing in the Keepsake before. And, by the way, now we think on it, it has another fault—and yet, perhaps, the fault we refer to is no fault at all; but we shall state it. The verses are not very intelligible—at least we have not discovered their signification, though we have given ourselves a headache trying to do so. A horrible suspicion has crossed us. Can it be that they are an illustration of Mr. Willison Glass’s profound remark, in his great epic upon The Penny Postage, that “True no-meaning puzzles more than wit”? We are unwilling to think so, more particularly as we have reason to believe that the “Ianthe” in question is Lord Melbourne’s cook!

Glancing over the “riches fineless” of the volume, our eye lights, by a magnetic attraction which it has for everything connected with the “Thieves’ Literature,” upon the following sonnet: ON READING AINSWORTH’S JACK SHEPPARD.

BY CHARLES CHICKENS, ESQ.

Much have I travailed ’mong the prigs of old,
And many goodly Sikes and Fagins seen;
With many Artful Dodgers have I been,
Whom beaks in fetters for Sir Peter hold.
Oft of the Red Room,* too, had I been told,
That deep file, Sheppard, ruled as his demesne,
Yet did I never know his might serene,

* The room from which “Sheppard, Jack, the marvellous boy,” as a great living writer in Tait’s Magazine has called him, made his escape. Vide Ainsworth’s “Jack Sheppard,” vol. iii.—Author’s note.

Till I heard Ainsworth speak out loud and bold.
Then felt I like some faker of men's clyes,
When a new doxy reels into his ken,—
Or like stout Curtis, when, with purple eyes,
He stared at green of turtle—winked, and then
Looked on each gobbet with a wild surmise,
SILENT UPON A BENCH OF ALDERMEN!

A noble sonnet! worthy of Keats. Indeed it may be doubted whether its illustrious author, in penning this tribute to the genius of his great contemporary, had not in his ear the stately melody of one of that short-lived bard's best known productions. It is unpleasant to throw a doubt upon the originality of any man, more especially of such a man as Charles Dickens, but surely he must confess his obligations to the "SONNET ON FIRST LOOKING INTO CHAPMAN'S HOMER." Nor need he feel any shame in making the confession. Has not his prototype, whose notions of rhyme were, owing to his Cockney education, somewhat perplexed, asked his own muse, on one occasion when she seems to have been giving herself airs,

Wherefore lineage wish ye higher
Than twin sister of Thalita?

And, in the same spirit, may not Mr. Dickens ask himself, whether he could possibly wish to stand as a poet above the level of John Keats? Arcades ambo, et cantare pares.

A pair of shepherds, fit to howl
Their songs and sonnets, cheek by jowl.

But what is this? Really this is too bad. Imitations, indeed! Why, who does not see a flagrant plagiarism from Alfred Tennyson, that ill-used poet, in

CAROLINE,

BY ALBERT PENNYROYAL, ESQ.

Lightsome, brightsome, cousin mine!
Easy, breezy Caroline!
With thy locks all raven-shaded,
From thy merry brow up-braided,
And thine eyes of laughter full,
Brightsome cousin mine!
Thou in chains of love hast bound me—
Wherefore dost thou flit around me,
Laughter-loving Caroline!

When I fain would go to sleep
In my easy chair,
Wherefore on my slumbers creep?
Wherefore start me from repose,
Tickling of my hooked nose,
Pulling of my hair!
Wherefore, then, if thou dost love me,
So to words of anger move me,
Corking of this face of mine,
Tricky cousin Caroline!

When a sudden sound I hear,—
Much my nervous system suffers,
Shaking through and through,— Cousin Caroline, I fear,
'Twas no other hand but you
Put gunpowder in the snuffers,
Springing such a mine!
'Twas no other but yourself,
Wicked, tricked, little elf,
Naughty cousin Caroline!

Pins she sticks into my shoulder,
Places needles in my chair,
And when I begin to scold her,
Tosses back her combed hair
With so saucy, vexed an air,

That the pitying beholder
Cannot brook that I should scold her:
Then, again, she comes, and, bolder,
Blacks anew this face of mine,
Artful cousin Caroline!

Would she only say she'd love me,
Winsome, tinsome Caroline,
Unto such excess 't would move me,
Teasing, pleasing cousin mine!
That she might the live-long day
Undermine the snuffer tray,
Tickle still my hooked nose,
Startle me from calm repose,
With her pretty persecution,
Throw the tongs against my shins,
Run me through and through with pins,
Like a pierced cushion;
Would she only say she'd love me,
Darning needles should not move me;
But, reclining back, I'd say
"Dearest! there's the snuffer tray,
Pinch, O pinch, those legs of mine!
Cork me, cousin Caroline!"

This charming effusion answers all the essentials of poetry, as laid down by Milton. It is "simple, sensuous, and passionate." What can be simpler than this, "wicked-tricked Caroline"—mark the Tennysonian felicity of the epithet,—pulling her cousin's "hooked" nose, springing a mine upon him from the snuffer tray, running needles into his easy chair, blackening his chin and eye-brows? These are the beautiful artifices of playful childhood, which has ever been proverbial for its simplicity. Sensuous it is too, for it is a succession of images throughout,—from the picture of the fair tormentor to the last convulsive spring of her cousin on finding a darning-needle buried in his person—there seeking "for itself an honourable grave;" and what can be more passionate, than the feelings which cousin Caroline's pretty tricks are calculated to excite, or the fine exclamation with which the verses close? These are qualities that appeal to the sympathies of all,—but the poem derives a peculiar interest, from a mysterious hint of the editor's, in a note, that it is written by an illustrious foreigner, "not a hundred miles from Windsor Castle," and is descriptive of the domestic habits of the still more illustrious partner of his joys and sorrows. We forbear speaking more openly on this interesting topic; but the reader must have remarked, that the lines are by Albert, Albert Pennyroyal. There have been worse aliases than this.

Haynes Bayley,—poor Haynes Bayley! Charming in thy six feet two! Irresistible in thy breadth of muscle, deadly in the exuberance of thy sable whiskers! Chanted from the drawing-room to the scullery! Beloved of boarding-schools,—idolized of susceptible haberdashers! Well do we remember thee, and fondly do we cherish, in the lumber-room of our memory, the last occasion of our meeting. That delicious rump-steak, that unctuous pot of Hanbury's entire! The mutton, too, over which we penned in joint inspiration—line about—the ballad, "We met, 'twas in a crowd," which the world has since stamped with immortality! The cozy parlour in "The Hen and Chickens," Hampstead, where we discussed our brandy-and-water and the state of parties together.—How fine the flavour of that sixth tumbler! the devilled turkey! But we dare not dwell on these touching recollections, which have forced themselves upon us, on stumbling upon the following ditty, by our departed friend. Tears pursue each other "down our innocent nose in piteous chase," as we hum over

THE LOVER'S CONFESSION.

It is not for thy rosy cheek,
Nor for thy locks so sunny bright,
It is not for thine eyes that speak
In sparkling words of diamond light!
It is not for thy voice so clear,
Thy smile, all cold reserve disarming,
That I do love thee, Mary, dear,
Though I confess that they are charming.

Thy thrilling glance, what joy, perchance
To find it softly bent on me,
When others in the many dance
Poussette and ladies'-chain with thee.
The quiet smile, that none perceive,
But he, whose bosom it doth fetter,
I like it much, but, ah! believe,
There's something I like greatly better.

When winds breathe low, and twilight's calm
Subdues the wearied earth to bliss,
Thy gentle voice falls like a balm
Upon a troubled heart like this.
Sweet, then, thy glances upward bent,
But, ah! there's something, Mary, sweeter,
Thy money in the three per cent
Consols strikes me as greatly neater.

There is an amiable candour in this, that is quite captivating. Our friend was not always so frank in letting it be seen, whence so much of the fine passion and poetry that glowed through his verses had its origin. It was left for a posthumous canonet to proclaim, what none knew better than Butterfly Bayley, that the god of love is too often but a god of tin! that moonshine and kisses are all very well, but that there is "metal" more attractive" even than these! It is quite cheering to parents, like ourselves, to know, that these lines, set to music, are to be had at all the music-shops, at the easy and accessible price of half-a-crown.

In wandering through such a wilderness of sweets as THE TOPAZ presents, one feels like a school-boy let loose in a pastry-cook's shop. Tartlets, cookies, London buns, all the sugared wealth of a Littlejohn, crowd upon his bewildered sight, and he stands, like the donkey between the bundles of hay in the fable, irresolute whether to pay his addresses to a hunk of gingerbread or to the sweet luxuriance of an Albert cake. In this dilemma, a current more or less will fix his choice,—on such niceties does the judgment often turn; and old recollections of a class of poetry,—the passionate Eastern cut-throat style,—which has now unfortunately fallen somewhat into abeyance, lead us to select for our next extract

THE CADI'S DAUGHTER.—A LEGEND OF THE BOSPHORUS.

BY LADY JULIANA DRIVELTON.

How beauteous is the star of night
Within the eastern skies,
Like the twinkling glance of the Toorkman's lance,
Or the antelope's azure eyes!

A lamp of love in the heaven above,
That star is fondly streaming,
And the gay kiosk and the shadowy mosque
In the Golden Horn are gleaming.

Young LEILA sits in her jasmine bower,
And hears the bulbul sing,
As it trills its throat to the first full note,
That anthems the flowery spring.
She gazes still, as a maiden will,
On that beauteous eastern star:
You may see the throb of her bosom's sob
Beneath the white cymar!

She thinks of him, who is far away,—
Her own brave Galligee,—
Where the billows foam and the hyrcanes roam,
On the wild Carpathian sea.
She thinks of the oath, that bound them both
Beside the stormy water,
And the words of love, that in Athen's grove
He spake to the Cadi's daughter.

"MY SELIM!" thus the maiden said—
"Though severed still we be,
By the raging deep and the mountain's steep,
My soul still yearns to thee.
Thy form so dear is mirrored here
In my heart's pellucid well,
As the rose looks up to Phingari's orb,
Or the moth to the gay gazelle!

"I think of the time, when the Kaftan's crime
Our love's young joys o'ertook,
And thy name still floats in the plaintive notes
Of my silver-toned chibouque.
Thy hand is red with the blood it has shed,
Thy soul, it is heavy laden,
Yet come, my Giaour, to thy Leila's bower,
Oh, come to thy Turkish maiden!"

A light step trod on the dewy sod,
And a voice was in her ear,
And an arm embraced young Leila's waist—
"Beloved! I am here!"
Like the Phantom Form, that rules the storm,
Appeared the Pirate Lover,
And his fiery eye was like Zatanai,
As he fondly bent above her.

"Speak, Leila, speak! for my light caïque
Rides proudly in yonder bay,
I have come from my rest to her I love best,
To carry thee, love, away.
The breast of thy lover shall shield thee and cover
My own Jemscheed from harm;
Think'st thou I fear the dark Vizier,
Or the Mufti's vengeful arm!

"Then droop not, love! nor turn away
From this rude hand of mine!"
And Leila looked in her lover's eyes,
And murmured—"I am thine!"
But a gloomy man with a yataghan
Stole through the acacia blossoms,
And the thrust he made with his gleaming blade
Hath pierced through both their bosoms.

"There, there! thou cursed castif' Giaour!
There, there, thou false one, lie!"
Remorseless HASSAN stands above,
And smiles to see them die.
They sleep beneath the fresh green turf,
The lover and the lady—
And maidens wait to hear the tale
Of the daughter of the Cadi!

There can be no doubt, that this is the finest Eastern poem which the Annuals have produced for many a day. It only wanted an Imaum, a Kiebaub, a few Minarets, and a Muezzin to be complete. It transports us into a strange world of bulbuls, caiques, yataghans, chibouques, and acacias, that stimulate the imagination in proportion as they perplex the understanding. Can anybody tell us who a Kaftan is? As for the Cadi, we doubt, but yet are unwilling for Leila's sake to believe, that he belongs to that respectable class of public servants—caddies we call them in Edinburgh—of whom a few specimens still linger about our own flesh and fish-markets, and carry home the purchases of sober housewives in wicker contrivances, familiarly known as creels, for a remunerating sum of copper currency. Surely, a "brave Galiongee"—although who that gentleman may be, we have not the faintest idea—could never lavish his affections on the daughter of such a man. It may be so, however; and the same weakness, which led King Cophetua to wed a beggar maid, may induce a Galiongee to cultivate a liaison with the daughter of a ticket-porter of Constantinople. The poet has also thrown a fine air of mystery about Hassan, "the gloomy man with the yataghan." It would be a relief to our minds, however, to know who he was.

To pass from the Dardanelles to sunny Italy, that land of love and lazzaroni, would be a transition easy as it is natural in romance. Fain, therefore, would we have presented our readers with a prose tale of great power, which woos us to select it,—"GIULIO GRUMBELLO, The Last of the Hurdysgurdies, by the Author of SNOOKS, a Tale of the Civil Wars." The well-known abilities of this writer, employed upon so exciting a theme, must have already stimulated the literary appetite of our readers to a most voracious pitch, but we must refer them to THE TOPAZ itself for the gratification of their curiosity, as want of space compels us to pass over this romance. By way of a solatium, as the lawyers call it, we present them with some lines of great beauty, to which a mournful interest attaches from their having been penned by the beautiful and accomplished Lady Caroline Maudlin, the night before her elopement with her father's footman,—a step which, our readers must recollect, excited very considerable sympathy and admiration in the fashionable world at the time. It seems that the editor of THE TOPAZ, by dint of that judicious perseverance which, as the work shows, has catered so successfully for the public, had effected an introduction to Lady Caroline's waiting-maid on her return from Gretna Green. That amiable female, yielding to the madness which ruled the hour, formed an attachment to him. He knew the weakness of the sex, and indulged it. But, amid the seductive frivolities of the tender passion, the stern duties of an editor were not lost sight of for a moment; and, in "a pliant hour," he succeeded in procuring from her this charming production, which had been written by her mistress on one of her curling papers. The delicacy with which the editor records his success is only equalled by the skilful generalship by which it was effected. But, for the poem, which is entitled

POETRY VERSUS PROSE.

Oh, mother dear, the sun shines bright,
But, ah, for me its light is shrouded;
The moon with radiance fills the night,
From me her radiant face is shrouded.

Around me flowerets thickly bloom,
Birds fill the air with notes of gladness,
But, ah! all—all partake the gloom
Of my too sore prevailing sadness.

I sit me down, and try to rouse
Gay dreams of pleasures fondly cherished,—
The hawthorn tree, the whispered vows,
That with the evening zephyrs perished;
And hours come back, when hope and love
Made life one long and glorious vision,
When all was fair and calm above,
And all below was bliss Elysian.

A numbness and a sense of pain,—
A drowsy unimpassioned feeling,—
A fire that smoulders in the brain,
Through all the listless pulses stealing;—
Preys on me through the live-long day,
Like a grim phantom haunts me nightly,
Takes feeling, thought, and power away,
Till all looks ghastly—all unsightly!

Life is a leafless blighted bough,—
This stifling pang, how may I smother?
What can I love, or live for now?
Oh, comfort me, my own dear mother!
Say, say what mean these fancies drear,
That on despair and frenzy border;—
"Pshaw! take this dose of salts, my dear.
"Tis just your stomach's out of order!"

Heartless and unfeeling parent! Her child is racked by a mixture of regrets and blighted hopes. She thinks only of Dr. Gregory's mixture. The lying subterfuges of a faithless lover overwhelm her daughter's spirit. She thinks but of febrifuges for her daughter's body. Blue devils torture the maiden's aching heart to madness. Her callous soul turns eagerly to blue pill and ipecacuanha. Byron and Little fly before Abernethy and Buchan; Galen chucks Cupid headlong out of window. A grovelling and prosaic spirit, which reduces everything to the mere physical element, scoffs at the maiden's more than "poetic pains," and tells her that the pangs of a highly sensitive temperament are no more than mere disorder of the gastric juices. Of such heartlessness we dare not trust ourselves to speak. But it is ever thus—in poetry. Mothers' hearts are like granulated whinstone, and fathers have no hearts at all.

The mournful spirit of the following lines haunts us. We see a lady in a lonely room, within a lofty tower. Night has struck across the heavens with the suddenness peculiar to a tropical region; and a lurid streak marks the line where the heaving ocean loses itself in the sky. The air is thick and sultry, the vampire-bat flits to and fro on heavy wing; and a hollow murmur rolling across the deep, and mingling with the clamour of the waves that dash upon the rocks beneath, deepens while it harmonizes with the melancholy thoughts of the lonely lady, as she sits at the casement,—her throbbing brow resting on her hand,—and looks abroad upon the wild and wasteful ocean heaving and panting beneath the leaden sky. Far from the merry voices of old friends, in a land of swarthy faces and stranger tongues, she thinks of home and English firesides. Voices once daily heard whisper about her; trees and green hedges grow brighter up before her moistening eyes; she feels the pressure of hands that once thrilled a welcome wherever she went; and the light of eyes, which it was a joy to see, is again about her. Her laden heart is full to bursting, and she pours forth its burden in a stream of passionate verse. Listen to the dirge-like music of

NIGHT THOUGHTS.

BY THE COUNTESS OF FITZ-PAINT, LADY OF THE GOVERNOR-GENERAL OF ALLINMINKEY.

On for the lyre of Sappho, to proclaim
The fiery passion of my bursting heart,
To strike a note upon the ear of Fame,
Should never fade! So might I then depart,
Dying upon the midnight with a start,
To wake up in another, brighter sphere,
Freed from the chains of sin and woe, that bind us here.

Roll on, thou mighty ocean, lift thy hoarse
And giant murmurs to the low'ring heaven,—
Wake up the terrors of thy trampling force,
Awing the hark on thy rough bosom driven,
Amid the thunder's crash and flashing levin;
My spirit loves thy grandeur and thy gloom,
Fit music for my life's dark and all dreary doom!

My earliest recollections, they are sad;
My lady mother walloped me all day,
I never had the sweetmeats others had,
No dolls had I, or picture-books for play;
My frocks were of the meanest stuff alway,
And so there gathered on my soul a sadness,
That after weary years has goaded nigh to madness.

Time flew apace—I was a forward girl,
But ah! my sorrows with my stature rose;
Mine was a spirit rich with the orient pearl,
And gold of love's romance, and its fine throes.
But I was plain, and had a snubbish nose,
And I did find myself, oh, direct pain!
A wretch that woos unloved, and loves and woos in vain.

And yet I thought he loved me—my dear Charles—
There was a silent smiling in his eyes,
We had our little bits of lovers' quarrels,
And sometimes he would heave unconscious sighs,
And squeeze my hand. But, oh, the dread surprise,
That fatal morn, I read in wild despair,
He had been married at St. George's, Hanover Square.

I never smiled again. That hollow smile,
Which gilds the sadness it cannot dispel,
Has mantled on my lips, and hung awhile,
Like glittering dew-drops on the Death-flower's bell.
I walked beneath a dark and fateful spell,
A lorn and blighted thing, and many thought
That I was gay—they were mistaken—I was not.

Life was made up of miserable hours,
And all of which I longed the brief possessing,
For which I wasted wishes, hopes, and powers,
Came with some fatal drawback on the blessing.
I gave myself up to a lord's caressing:
The settlements were handsome—the trousseau.
They were the victim's garlands, alas! now I know.

For though a lord, he simply is a brute;
And exiled here within this torrid clime
Of gnats and negroes, and unwholesome fruit,
Cigars and arrack punch absorb his time,
Deaf to the music of my plaining rhyme;
And to the moaning winds my lays I pour,
Lone sitting by the caves of bleak Mongolia's shore.

Hark, from the dining-room ascends his rude,
Discordant voice, proclaiming to the walls,
"A lass is good, and eke a glass is good!"
Besotted wretch! while my lone heart recalls
Those charming soirées, concerts, fancy balls,
Where I, the centre of a glittering throng,
Talked sentiment and scandal all night long.

They are about me now—those merry faces—
That made their talk, though very small, so sweet,
These lancer officers—the dear scapegraces—
Eager to cast them at my tiny feet.
With a wild throb of joy my pulses beat,

But, no! They fade like shadows from my view,
And life assumes again its old sepulchral hue.
Hear him, the noisy brute, he's getting drunk!
I know he is. 'Tis ever so with him.

'Tis nuts to him to see my spirits sunk,
While his dull senses in strong spirits swim.
It shall not be! I'll ring for Mrs. Pym,—
Get up hot water, and we'll show him, whether
We cannot make, ha, ha! a night of it together!
Moan on, ye winds, roar on, ye restless waves,
Your organ-tones about my sea-built tower,
Pealing your dismal knell o'er watery graves,
Where princely navies swamp at midnight hour!
Swell up my heart with your majestic power,
And, while my fell despair its anguish howls,
My woman, Pym, and I shall get as drunk as owls.

CASTLE VAMPTRE, 1st Nov., 1840.

In the desponding state of mind into which our last extract has thrown us, it is a relief to turn to a writer who strikes a bolder note. With a joyful surprise, which we know our readers will share, we have stumbled on the following sonnet. The initials of the author need no Oedipus to unriddle, and we leave the Editor's note to speak for itself. The hint of the authorship which it conveys is in the best newspaper style.

SONNET TO BRITAIN.

BY THE D— OF W—

[Deep as our obligations are to the many noble and literary characters who have enriched the pages of THE TOPAZ by their contributions, we feel assured that we reflect no discredit upon any of them, when we state our candid and impartial opinion, that the splendid MILITARY and PATRIOTIC SONNET, which we have now the good fortune to present to our readers, will be regarded by all competent judges as the brightest and most original GEM that has ever appeared in this or in any other Miscellany. Motives of delicacy, which our readers will at once appreciate, have prevented us from disclosing, in its full blaze of European celebrity, the name of THE ILLUSTRIOUS INDIVIDUAL who has selected us as the medium of conveying his military opinions, clothed in the "sounding robes" of verse, to a gratified world. Still, we feel assured that there are none so dull of apprehension as not at once to perceive, from the terseness of the composition, the boldness of its character, its laconic simplicity, and its martial determination, that it could have emanated only from one honoured pen, which has been wielded almost as successfully as his sword, and with at least as much DESPATCH, by THE GREATEST CAPTAIN OF THE AGE.]

Halt! Shoulder arms! Recover! As you were!
Right wheel! Eyes left! Attention! Stand at ease!
O Britain! O my country! Words like these Have made thy name a terror and a fear
To all the nations. Witness Ebro's banks,
Assaye, Toulouse, Nivelle, and Waterloo,
Where the grim despot muttered—Sauve qui peut!
And Ney fled dorkling. Silence in the ranks!
Inspired by these, amidst the iron crash
Of armies, in the centre of his troop
The soldier stands—unmoveable, not rash—
Until the forces of the foemen drop;
Then knocks the Frenchmen to eternal smash,
Pounding them into mummy. Shoulder, hoop!

If for nothing else, the public must feel themselves under no common obligations to the Editor of THE TOPAZ, and to ourselves, for laying before them this perfect piece of poetical workmanship—fine as anything turned out by the practised hand of Wordsworth himself. But panegyric is barren to sound its merits; and it is therefore best at once to "let expressive silence muse its praise." One thing, however, we cannot refrain from suggesting, and we trust the hint may be followed out in the proper quarter. These masterly lines ought to be inscribed upon the pedestal of the Wellington Testimonial, about to be erected, with so much unanimity of feeling, upon a prominent site in The Goosedubs of the western metropolis. These and Marochetti's bust together, will form a testimonial for Europe to admire.

Any verses must appear tame after the noble effusion just quoted; but there is a stately serenity about the following stanzas by Sir E. L. Cheveley, that will bear a juxtaposition with it better than any of the others which enrich the pages of THE TOPAZ. Suppose a dish of buttered crumpets consumed, tea discussed, and "the things" removed: Scene—A parlour in a cottage ornée in Devon, or any other romantic shire;—Time—Twilight;—Dramatis personæ—A handsome woman and a not unhandsome man, with that pale and engaging style of face which a love of literature and dissipation is well known to communicate, and you will be prepared to enter fully into the spirit of

EVENING.

Open the lattice, Mary! Let the breeze,
With its soft voice, whisper into the room,
And let me hear the rustling of the trees,
And scent the closing floweret's rich perfume.
Thanks, Mary! There! I feel it fan my cheek;
O blessed breeze, and stirring through my hair,
Like her soft fingers, that in childhood's weak
And helpless hours did bless my evening prayer.

Sit by me, Mary! See, the silver moon
Hath hung her cresset in the azure high,
And all the mighty world of stars will soon
With their bright blazonry, o'erspread the sky.
Sit by me, dearest! Here, with none beside,—
The servants all, methinks, have gone to bed,—
These quiet orbs, that o'er us softly glide,
Upon our hearts their holy calm shall shed.

Hark, where from yonder grove the nightingale
Pours out the passion of her fiery heart,
Trilling her notes all up and down the scale,
Like Gisi in some very touching part.
While the grave owl, that in yon abbey sits,
'Mid ruins smouldering in immortal smash,
Throws in a casual hoot, that counterfeits
The contrabasso of the old Lablache.

And ever and anon the rushing brook,
Breaks through the stillness with a pleasant sound,—
That stream, where only yesterday I took Trouts some three dozen, weighing each a pound.
How nice they were at dinner, love, you know—
But we of that shall talk some other time—
This hour and spot be sacred to the flow
Of high thoughts, springing from a source sublime.

In this calm nook, sequestered from
Of eager bailiff, and tormenting
The hum and humbug of our hum-
Unheard, unfelt, afar from us
No friends, that on us for our dinner
Are here—no scandal-mongers
No smooth tuft-hunters, to crain
Warm protestations, that are

Here I repose on Nature's
And thine, my Mary's,
And list, exulting, in my
To the fine harmonies
The sparkling morn-
Of winds and wa-
Come on my soul
Sweet as yon

And I forget, that ever I have been
The erring suitor of a vain renown,
Raised on the columns of a Magazine,
A literary dandy known on town.
Insane ambition! for so much per sheet,
To melt my soul into enfeebling rhymes,
For bread-and-butter misses only meet,
And the weak columns of the Weekly Times!

Romance I've written, as old Bentley knows.

I live it now,—for in thy arms, I wean,
Oft have I tasted most poetic prose,
Thy rosy lips my daily Hippocrene.
This kiss to me is like ambrosial food—

Nay, dearest, do not turn away thy head!
"Have done, now, Charles, you're getting very rude.
Love, don't you think we'd better go to bed?"

That last appeal is irresistible to any man possessed of a spark of the domestic affections. It shows the hand of a master. It is this fine mixture of real life with the aspirations of a romantic nature, that gives such a charm to the pages of "The Schoolmaster Assassin," "The Dandy Wayman," and "The Siamese Twins;" and now has their author evinced these qualities better in the verses just quoted. The vivid description that brings the fragrance of the flowers, the light, the emerging stars, and all that scene before us; the agreeable interfusion of music and sounds, with recollections of the snug spunging-house; the poetry of the rushing brook; the plaintive description of the decay, and the gradual knowledge till the bard is lost in the clouds, transported into a vivacity of feeling, the womanly trepidations of the beauties that must have satisfied if all the author of "Alice's Adventures" were spent in this way, would be agreeably indeed.

rigid economy of the Prison Board enjoined that it should serve gentlemen under restraint both for table and chairs. Hagart therefore felt himself rather at a loss for a missile to arm himself with against the arrival of his jailor, whom, as his language has already intimated to the reader, he meant to receive with considerable warmth. He searched every cranny and crevice of his cell, in hopes to find a stick or bar, which it is well known that jailors are constantly in the habit of leaving in a prisoner's way. But the recent scarcity of firewood had compelled Rusty Rob to turn every stray piece of timber to account; and our hero's search was fruitless.

The minutes were gliding rapidly away. Something must be done. He sprang upon his bed, which was immediately under the window, and seeking one of the iron bars of the grating, attempted to wrench it from its socket. It was a noble thing to see the Herculean efforts which he made to dislodge it, and the purpose he had in view lent a moral dignity to his exertions. It was a human being struggling for freedom—freedom, the attribute of the savage, the terror of the despot! In vain he tugged and tore, till the blood sprang from his fingers, and he was, in the romantic language of Miss Wilhelmina Skeggs, "all in a muck of sweat." At last, when he had almost begun to despair, a violent wrench dislodged a fragment of stone from the wall, and it fell with a sharp patter on the floor of the cell.

"I'll do the trick yet," exclaimed Hagart, jumping down from his bed, and picking up the stone. He weighed it in his hand, and then placed his forefinger to his nose with the serene dignity of a resolute man. "A pretty tidy bit of a marble, and will scuttle his nob finely. My namesake gave that giant chap his kale with less,"—alluding to an incident in Jewish History, with which his boyhood's studies had made him familiar.

With this he seated himself upon the bed, and deliberately pulling up the indispensable garment which covered his left leg, proceeded to undo the fastening that held up his stocking, and which, at the period of which we write, was called a garter. Throwing it aside with a hasty impatience, he pulled off his stocking by turning it over at the top, and then drawing it towards the heel inside out. This done, he once more poised the stone in his hand, and surveyed it with a fond yet anxious glance. This was the work of a moment. The next it was rolling down the inside of the stocking, and only paused when it had reached the toe and found itself unable to proceed further. This was all that Hagart desired, and now he had to think of some means of fastening the stone in its place. He tore a few threads from his bed-cover—twisted them into a cord, fastened it round the stocking above the stone, and tied a knot upon it.

"That's your sort!" he exclaimed, as he saw his task complete, and tried the balance of his weapon, by aiming two or three playful blows at an imaginary jailor, supposed to be reposing on the couch which our hero had pressed for the last fifteen weary nights.

As every moment brought the jailor nearer to him his excitement grew more intense. He tried to divert his attention by whistling "The Deil among the Tailors," and other popular melodies of the period; but when the mind is charged with a fatal purpose such as that which now engrossed him, a national air is out of place, and a lillibullero a hollow mockery. Hagart, always alive to a feeling of the appropriate in nature and art, felt this to be the case, and he gave it up. Scarcely had he done so, when the heavy clank of the jailor's shoes sounded along the passage."

We omit a good deal of interesting dialogue in the passage between Rusty Rob and his wife, which Hagart is supposed to hear, but, as it consists for the most part of profane swearing on both sides, the reader, who is partial to this species of oral communication, may fill it up from fancy.

The key turned in the lock—the bolt fell. Slowly and heavily the door grated on its hinges, for it had not been oiled for three years and two months. David is behind it. In his hand he holds the stocking,—the stocking with the stone. Thrice has he raised it, and prepared to bring it down upon the jailor's head. But that unsuspecting myrmidon of a sanguinary law had been seized at the threshold with a sudden fit of coughing, which delayed his entrance for some time, and thrice David's hand descended to its former place, its purpose unaccomplished. At last the pulmonary impediment was removed, and Rusty Rob advanced.

"Tumble up, my kiddy!" he exclaimed, as he stepped beyond the door.—Another moment, and he was stretched lifeless and bleeding on the floor. Hagart's aim was a sure one,—the stone, a fragment of the hardest whin,—and the centrifugal action, caused by the intervention of the stocking, made it descend with terrific force. Rusty Rob gave a groan.

"I have queered the beaks, and given the dubsman a holiday," said Hagart, as he leaped over the hedge into the highroad for Edinburgh and—the gallows.

To take the taste of this powerful extract out of our readers' mouths, we must return to the poetry of THE TOPAZ, and there is a freshness and dramatic vigour in the following ballad from the Spanish, that give it an admirable fitness for our purpose. The Editor's note upon it is as follows:—

By the kindness of the distinguished author we are enabled to present to our readers the following beautiful version of a most beautiful Moorish ballad. We understand it is to be included in a new and highly illustrated edition of "The Spanish Ballads," which will shortly issue from the press.

THE BROKEN PITCHER.

FROM THE SPANISH.

BY J. G. SCALPHAUT, ESQ.

It was a Moorish maiden was sitting by a well,
And what the maiden thought of, I cannot, cannot tell,
When by there rode a valiant knight from the town of Oviedo,

Alphonzo Guzman was he hight, the Count of Desaparedo.

"Oh, maiden, Moorish maiden! why sitt'st thou by the spring!

Say, dost thou seek a lover, or any other thing?
Why gazest thou upon me, with eyes so large and wide,
And wherefore doth the pitcher lie broken by thy side?"

"I do not seek a lover, thou Christian knight so gay,
Because an article like that hath never come my way;
And why I gaze upon you, I cannot, cannot tell,
Except that in your iron hose you look uncommon swell.

"My pitcher it is broken, and this the reason is,
A shepherd came behind me, and tried to snatch a kiss;
I would not stand his nonsense, so ne'er a word I spoke,
But scored him on the costard, and so the jug was broke.

"My uncle, the Alcaydè,—he waits for me at home,
And will not take his tumbler, until Zorayda come.
I cannot bring him water,—the pitcher is in pieces—
And so I'm sure to catch it, 'cos he wallops all his nieces."

"Oh maiden, Moorish maiden! wilt thou be ruled by me?
So wipe thine eyes, and rosy lips, and give me kisses three,
And I'll give thee my helmet, thou kind and courteous lady,

To carry home the water to thy uncle the Alcaydè."

He lighted down from off his steed—he tied him to a tree—

He bowed him to the maiden, and took his kisses three:
"To wrong thee, sweet Zorayda, I swear would be a sin!"
He knelt him at the fountain, and dipped his helmet in.

Uprose the Moorish maiden—behind the knight she steals,

And caught Alphonzo Guzman up tightly by the heels,
She tipped him in and held him down beneath the bubbling water,

"Now, take thou that for venturing to kiss Al Hamet's daughter!"

A Christian maid is weeping in the town of Oviedo, She waits the coming of her love, the Count of Desperado. I pray you all in charity, that you will never tell, How he met the Moorish maiden beside the lonely well.

With this beautiful specimen of the Spanish lyrical muse we must close our poetical extracts; for we feel we have not done justice to the prose contributors to THE TOPAZ, in allowing them to wait so long outside. And even now we are at a loss on which to fix, for we have only left ourselves room for one specimen. Professor Buckland must forgive us for not quoting his "Pre-Adamite Field Sports, or a Day's Shooting among the Megatheria!" Mr. Jerrold, be not wroth with us, for that we pass over your "Jeremy Snout, The Man that Blew his Nose." You have our best wishes, Mr. Samuel Warren; but your "Shilling a Day," though full of the most diverting legal technicalities, is too long for us. Your "Amiable Assassin, or the Bloody Nose, a Tale of Lambeth Marsh," Mr. Fitzball, would add to any reputation but your own. The interest, however, is of too harrowing a nature for our pages; and we believe we shall at once gratify the public more, and illustrate the characteristics of Annual Tales better, by printing

THE FLYING DUTCHMAN.

A TALE OF THE SEA.

BY THOMAS PIERCE PEWK,

Captain of the barge Swiftsure, Union Canal.

We were in the midst of the storm-tossed Atlantic. A heavy simoom, blowing N.E. by S., brought in the huge tropical billows mast-high from the Gulf of Labrador, and awoke old ocean, roaring in its fury, from its unfathomable depths. No moon was visible among the hurricane rack of the sky—even the pole-star, sole magnet of the mariner's path, was buried in the murky obscurity of the tempest; nor was it possible to see which way the ship was steering, except by the long track of livid flame which followed in the wake of the bow, or when, at times, some huge leviathan leapt up from the water beside us, and descending with the vehemence of a rock hurled from heaven, drove up a shower of aquatic splinters, like a burst of liquid lava from the sea. All the sails which usually decorated the majestic masts of H. M. S. Syncope, (a real seventy-nine of the old Trafalgar build, teak-built, and copper-fastened,) were reefed tightly up, with the exception of the main-sail, the spritsail, the mizen-boom sail, and a few others of minor consequence. Everything was cleared away—halyards, hencoop, and binnacle, had been taken down below, to prevent accidents; and the whole of the crew, along with the marines and boarders, piped to their hammocks. No one remained upon deck except the steersman, as usual lashed to the helm; Josh. Junk, the first bos'un; and the author of this narrative, who was then a midshipman on board the vessel, commanded by his uncle, Commodore Sir Peregrine Pendant.

"Skewer my timbers!" exclaimed Mr. Junk, staggering from one side of the deck to the other, as an enormous wave struck us on the lee-side, and very nearly unshipped the capstan. "Skewer my timbers, if this a'n't enough to put an admiral's pipe out! Why, Master Tom, d'ye see, its growing altogether more and more darkerer; and if it a'n't clearer by twelve bells, we'll be obligated to drop anchor, which a'n't by no means so pleasant, with a heavy swell like this, running at nineteen knots an hour in the middle of the wide Atlantic. How's her head, boy?"

"North by south it is, sir," replied the steersman.

"Keep her seven points more to the west, you lubber! Always get an offing, when there's a wet sheet and a flowing sea. That's right, Jem! Hold her hard abaft, and she'll go slick before the wind, like a hot knife through a pound of butter. Halloo, Master Tom, are you holding on by the seat railings already—you a'n't sick, are you? Shall I tell the steward to fetch a basin?"

"No, no, Josh," I replied, "'tis nothing—merely a temporary qualm. But tell me—do you really apprehend any danger? If so, would it not be prudent to call up the commodore, and hang out the dead-lights?"

"Why, Master Tom," replied the bos'un, turning his quid, "them ere's kevestions as I can't answer. 'Cos, first—there's no knowing what danger is till it comes; secondly, it's as much as my place is worth to disturb old Fire-and-Faggots—axing your pardon for the liberty—afore he's finished his grog with the mates below; and thirdly, its no use hanging out the dead-lights, 'cos we're entirely out of oil."

"Gracious heavens!" cried I, "and suppose any other ship should be in the same latitude?"

"Then," said the bos'un with all imaginable coolness, "I reckon it would be a case of bump. Oak versus teak, as the law-wers say, and Davy Jones take the weakest.—But hitch my trowsers! what's that?"

As the non-commissioned officer spoke, a bright flash was seen to the seaward immediately a-head of our vessel. It was too bright, too intense to proceed from any meteoric phenomena, such as sometimes are witnessed in those tropical climates, and the sullen report which immediately followed, indicated too clearly that it proceeded from some vessel in the vicinity.

"A first-rater, by jingo!" said Mr. Junk, and in distress. Hold my telescope, Master Tom, till I go below and turn out the watch,"—but that instant his course was arrested.

Scarce a second had elapsed after the sound of the discharge reverberated through our rigging, when, only a hawser's distance from our bowsprit, a phosphoric light seemed to rise from the bosom of the shadowy deep. It hung upon the hull, the binnacle, the masts, the yards of a prodigious ship, pierced apparently for three tiers of guns, which, with every sail set, bore down direct upon us. One moment more, and collision was inevitable, but Junk, with prodigious presence of mind, sprang to the helm, snatched the wheel from the hands of the petrified steersman, and luffed with almost supernatural force. Like a well-trained courser who obeys the rein, our noble ship instantly yielded to the impulse, and bore up a-lee, whilst the stranger came hissing up, and shot past us so close, that I could distinctly mark each lineament of the pale countenances of the crew as they stood clustered upon the rigging, and even read, so powerful was that strange, mysterious light, the words painted within her sides,—"THOSE WHO GO ABOARD THE BINNACLE PAY CASH FARE!" On, she drove, a lambent coruscation, cleaving the black billows of the Atlantic main, about to vanish amidst the deep darkness of the night.

"That was a near shave, anyhow," said Mr. Junk, relinquishing the wheel, "but we must know something more of that saucy clipper," and catching up a speaking-trumpet, he hailed,—

"Ship, ahoy!"

"Ship yourself!" was the response.

"What's your name?"

"What's yours?"

"Syncope,—Britannic Majesty's seventy-nine,—for Trinidad."

"Yung fraw,—merchant-ship, for Rotterdam."

"What cargo?"

"Soap!" was the reply. "How are you off for it! Ha! ha!"

A peal of diabolic laughter rolled across the deep, mingled with the rushing of the waves and the whistling of the winds. Another flash,—another report,—and the meteor light sunk as noiselessly as it had arisen into the bosom of the watery surge. At that moment the moon burst out from behind a cloud, clear and queenlike, illuminating the ocean for miles. We rushed to the stern and looked back. In vain! no vestige of a ship was there,—we were alone upon the warring waters!

"By the Lord Harry!" said the bos'un, dropping the trumpet,—"as sure as my name's Josh. Junk, that 'ere was the FLYING DUTCHMAN!"

That night we were SWAMPED AT SEA!

STATISTICS OF THE RETREAT LUNATIC ASYLUM NEAR YORK, SINCE THE YEAR 1796.

It is upwards of fifty years since public attention was turned to the mismanagement of the insane both in public and private Lunatic Asylums; and to the shameful neglect, and positive cruelty with which the miserable patients were too often treated, in what were imagined the best conducted of these establishments. Among the other means by which gross abuses were brought to light, were the investigations made, by Howard the Philanthropist, into the state of prisons.

Among the asylums into the internal economy of which inquiry was craved, was that of York. The attempt gave rise to a fierce local controversy; in which, so far back as 1788, Mason the poet took an active part, and wrote a pamphlet in support of investigation into the alleged abuses. As is too frequently the case in this country, these humane attempts were completely baffled: the vested interests in abuse combining, as is usual, to oppose inquiry in one department, which might have led to inquiry in some other. The result was, that the Lunatic Asylum of York—one of the worst conducted, when all were ill-conducted—remained for upwards of twenty years longer in the most disgraceful condition. While this attempt at reform, and at obtaining justice and showing mercy to the most pitiable and defenceless of God's creatures, was going forward unsuccessfully, the relatives of a quaker confined in the asylum happened to be refused admittance to him; and the patient shortly afterwards died in confinement. This circumstance and the previous excitement roused the feelings of his benevolent sect, and by 1793 they had erected The Retreat; the first lunatic asylum in Great Britain in which kind treatment and moral influences were employed in place of cold, filth, the whip and the gag, strait-waistcoats and fetters, and the other ingenious modes of cruelty, which made these places of confinement more resemble the dungeons of the Inquisition than retreats for the restoration of mental health, or the safe keeping of the irrecoverable. When the Retreat had been established for nearly twenty years, an account of the new system, and of its salutary results, was published by Mr. Samuel Tuke, a quaker of York; who, at a still longer interval, now, in 1841, writes the advertisement prefixed to the Report and Statistical Tables before us. These form the most complete body of Medical Statistics that has ever fallen under our observation; minutely, and at even tedious length, exhibiting the results of forty-four years unremitting observation.

Before briefly examining this Report, we may, for the encouragement of others to persevere in well-doing, advert to the issue of the controversy begun by Mason and his humane associates. They were, in the first instance, and after repeated efforts, defeated; but the erection of The Retreat was one early and most important consequence of their attempt, and of the pertinacity of the Governors of the York Asylum, and those who made common cause with them, in opposing inquiry and reform. The appearance of Mr. Tuke's Report of the Retreat, by piquing the jealousy of the physician of the York Asylum, renewed the controversy; and, as soon as a door was opened, led to discoveries which ultimately issued in the whole officers connected with that establishment being dismissed, with the exception of the physician, who had indignantly resented the incidental observations of Mr. Tuke, and who was probably ignorant of the true condition of the Asylum, however culpable such ignorance may have been. It also led to the adoption of the system of treatment begun in "The Retreat." It is worth while to trace the history of this contest.

When, in 1814, a Parliamentary Committee was appointed to inquire into the state of all Lunatic Asylums, a shameful attempt was made to elude inquiry at York; or to render it subservient to the purposes of those interested in concealing the truth. The public mind was again excited:—the controversy of the former century was renewed; and thirteen public-spirited individuals having qualified themselves to be governors, by paying twenty pounds each, while a subscription among some of the ladies of York defrayed the expense of bringing witnesses from a distance, the investigation was thoroughly accomplished, with the result we have noticed above. We are induced to cite a few paragraphs from the Report of the Parliamentary Committee, to show what was the actual condition of a Lunatic Asylum, where all examination had been pertinaciously resisted for twenty-five years, and of which the governors officially certified that the patients "were treated with all possible care and humanity." In the evidence given before the Committee, by Godfrey Higgins, Esq., a county magistrate, is found this passage:—"At eight in the morning of the day of meeting, I went to the Asylum determined to examine very carefully every part of it. After having seen (as I was told by Atkinson the steward) all the rooms for the reception of patients, I went with him to the kitchen apartments, and there caused several doors to be opened; and being at last struck with the retired appearance of one door, which was almost concealed from observation by another opening upon it, I ordered one of the keepers to unlock it. I thought I perceived fear and hesitation. I repeated my order in somewhat stronger language. The men-servants' key was tried but would not open it, as it was the door of cells for female patients. The key not being readily forthcoming I grew warm, and declared I would soon find a key that would unlock it at the kitchen fireside. It was then opened. I went in, and discovered a row of cells, four in number, with a door out of the furthest into the yard. On entering the first cell I found it in a state dreadful beyond description. Some miserable bedding was lying on straw which was daubed with wet, and excrement, and urine: the boarded floor was perfectly saturated with filth. . . . The details are here too disgusting to be farther given. It is enough that these cells were, in the words of the witness, "occupied at night by thirteen women, who were then up stairs." I ordered one of the men to conduct me to them. I found thirteen of these wretched inmates in a room twelve feet long, by seven feet ten inches wide, with a window which, not opening, would not admit of ventilation. After looking at these miserable objects, I returned to examine the cells more minutely. Except in the first, there was no other bedding than straw, which appeared to have been long in use, as it was absolutely saturated with wet."

These dens had been concealed when the Committee were examining the state of the apartments, to see what improvement could be made in the Asylum, and were only discovered by the acuteness and firmness of Mr. Higgins. A physician, who had previously noticed the doors, was told that they were cellars and other little domestic offices. Next day this spirited magistrate returned to the Asylum, and discovered that the young men-servants of the establishment could, by means of their keys, at all times admit themselves to the lodging-rooms of the upper class of female patients. Another magistrate, Bryan Cooke, Esq., testified that the general state of the Asylum was filthy in the extreme. But in this establishment, enormities and abuses of all kinds had long prevailed, and investigation had been refused. So much for the proximate causes of the erection of The Retreat; which was a good issuing from evil.

The account of the grand experiment, first instituted there, of treating the insane not as something below brute animals in the scale of intelligence, but as rational beings in a deranged state of health, was of very great interest in 1813, when it appeared. It is of great interest still, as having led the way to so many improvements, and finally to an entire and happy revolution in the manner of treating insanity. The same methods that were originally introduced in the Quaker Asylum, are now systematically practised, and even improved upon, in all well-regulated asylums, and in some of them with equal, if not superior efficiency. Still, The Retreat remains remarkable for the number of recoveries.

These, on the whole period of forty-four years, are 47.31 per cent.; and had the institution been limited to quakers, the recoveries would have been 50.18 per cent. But though the Retreat is mainly intended for persons connected with the Society of Friends, other patients are received. The rate of mortality is comparatively low; and the rate of longevity, in the hopeless cases, is above the ordinary average. Of the ninety-one cases remaining under cure at the date of the Report, thirteen have been in the Asylum for from twenty to forty years, and four cases from forty to forty-three years; or from the opening of the Institution. A Report framed from so long a course of observation, and with so much minuteness and accuracy, must needs contain a great deal of valuable information, though the field of survey has not been wide. Of its nature, the reader may judge from a few extracts, taken from the Statistical Report prefixed to the fifty-one statistical Tables. Though the greater portion of patients received into the Retreat have been females—at the rate of fifty-five females to forty-five males—the Report confirms the old opinion that women are somewhat less subject to insanity than men; and that the probability of the recovery of females is also greater. "As regards the origin of the disorder, by far the largest proportion, amounting to one-third of the whole, is found to be attacked from twenty to thirty years of age, and the proportions gradually decrease for each subsequent decennial period of life."

The probable causes of insanity, a topic full of interest, are thus discussed:—

In a very small proportion of the cases, or 43 only, [out of 615] was no probable cause for the disorder either stated or ascertained. In more than a third of the whole number, there appeared to have been two causes in operation in the same case. One of these had more frequently been of long standing, and appeared to have predisposed to the malady; whilst the other more often immediately preceded the attack, of which it was regarded as the immediate or exciting cause. The causes have, therefore, been classified under the two heads of predisposing (Table 13) and exciting (Table 14) causes. Great difficulty attaches, in practice, to the determination of the causes of insanity; and with the exciting causes in particular, early symptoms of the disorder may very readily be confounded. Hence, the results which have been arrived at, though very carefully scrutinized, are only to be regarded as approximations to truth. It will be seen that the same circumstance is, in several instances, introduced into the table of predisposing, and also into that of exciting causes; but it need scarcely be remarked, that in no case is one and the same circumstance regarded as having operated in both ways, in the same individual. The causes are further divided, into the physical and moral; the physical predominating, to a great extent, amongst the predisposing, and the moral exceeding the physical amongst the exciting, causes. Where two causes were assigned, one was generally of a physical, and the other of a psychical or moral character.

The causes of the recurrence of the disorder in cases of readmission, were very seldom assigned; and, where they were so, frequently consisted of the same circumstance as that alleged on the first admission. . . .

Although all the alleged causes are deserving of very serious attention; bearing, as they do, upon the highest department of the healing art,—preventive medicine or hygiene;—yet, in this place, attention need only be directed to such of them as, from one circumstance or another, appear to call for particular comment.

The predisposing causes have generally attracted less attention than the exciting; and, from their frequently insidious character, are often altogether overlooked; though there is every reason for believing that, of the two, they are frequently the more important; whilst it is certain that they are also, in many instances, more easily guarded against.

Predisposing Causes.—In 232, of the 415 persons, the predisposing causes were of a physical character. Of these, there were 70 in whom hereditary predisposition was the only predisposing cause known. In 73 other cases, however, in which there were other predisposing causes assigned, the same kind of predisposition also existed; so that 142, or about one-third of the whole number of persons admitted, laboured under an hereditary predisposition to insanity. This, though a large proportion, when compared with results obtained at the large pauper institutions, where so much less is known of the history of the cases, is by no means so as compared with other observations.

There were 50 persons in whom congenital weakness of mind, in different degrees, appears to have acted as the predisposing cause of the insanity which supervened upon it. In a few of the cases the deficiency was considerable, and amounted nearly, if not quite, to imbecility, or partial idiocy; but by far the greater number were not of that class, but consisted of persons decidedly below mediocrity of understanding, and of that sensitive and fragile mental constitution which is ill calculated for coping with the ills and difficulties of life. A still larger number might perhaps have been properly included under this head.

There were likewise 33 individuals who, though not of particularly weak mind, yet from early life had evinced very decided mental peculiarity, which, after the development of actual insanity, could hardly be looked upon but as having constituted an original predisposition. The eight persons who had been marked by extreme degrees of the melancholic and nervous temperaments, might perhaps have been included in the same group.

In 3 persons, a predisposition has been attributed to lactation by a parent strongly predisposed to insanity. They consisted of a brother and two sisters, who laboured under different forms of mental derangement; and who all died in the institution. It was stated that, the only member of the family who did not manifest more or less decided symptoms of insanity, was also the only one who had not, during his infancy, been nourished by his mother. There may, however, have been more of coincidence than cause in this circumstance.*

Two blind persons were admitted, in whom the loss of vision, acting in one case upon a suspicious temper, was thought to have predisposed to the disorder.

Dyspeptic and other disorders of the stomach and organs of digestion appear to have acted as predisposing causes in 18, and, more doubtfully, as exciting causes in 11 cases.

Moral Causes.—The uncertainty which must nearly always more or less apply to the assigned causes of insanity, may be observed to do so with still greater force to those of a moral, than to those of a physical character; it being amongst the former, that the danger of mistaking early symptoms of the disorder for causes is more particularly found.

In four cases a neglected or perverted education, which in three instances was extremely indulgent, and in one very rigid, appears more or less decidedly to have acted as a predisposing cause; confirming the remark, "that in several instances the foundation of the disease appears to have been laid in an injudicious indulgence in early life; by which the ill-trained man has been brought into contact with the oppositions and difficulties of the world, without the habits of endurance or self-government."

Various degrees of ill-regulated temper and disposition had been noticed before the supposed origin of the disorder, in eleven cases; but it is extremely doubtful whether, in some of these, the characteristics alluded to were not really indicative of an incipient or obscure form of mental disorder, such as is now generally recognised under the name of Moral Insanity. The predisposition in ten persons appeared to be laid in the long-continued operation of mental disquietude from various causes. Under this head, perhaps, might also have been included one case connected with political enthusiasm; and nine with excitement connected with religious hopes, fears, and speculations.

Exciting Causes.—Table 14.—Of 121 persons in whom the exciting cause was of a physical description, there were 16 in whom it might be traced to fevers and febrile diseases; 10 to mechanical injuries of the head; and 6 to inflammation of the brain. In 5 persons the exciting cause consisted in apoplexy or paralysis; and in 12 cases, in epilepsy. In one case each, apoplexy and paralysis, and in 4 other cases, epilepsy appear to have acted as predisposing causes. Of the 16 cases in which epilepsy had preceded the development of insanity, one only was discharged recovered, and he has since had a recurrence of the disorder, which, after the lapse of about eight years, has only been very partially recovered from. It must be stated, however, that none of these cases were of recent occurrence when admitted. Of the 5 cases which were connected with apoplexy, either as an exciting or predisposing cause, two were discharged recovered. Both the cases connected with paralysis were discharged recovered, and the individuals have for a long period been filling useful positions in the world.

Excepting in reference to the intemperate use of alcoholic and fermented liquors, no particular remark, as to the various exciting causes of a physical character, which follow in the table, appears to be called for.

The number of persons connected with the Society of Friends, in whom this was supposed to have acted as an exciting cause of mental disorder, was 21. Of this number five were females, two of whom were also addicted to the use of opium. There were likewise seven persons in whom intemperance and free living were thought to have acted as a predisposing cause.

In several of the cases, it was doubtful whether the intemperance which had preceded the attack of insanity could really be regarded as its cause; in some of these instances the amount of intemperance was so small as justly to lead to doubt in this respect; and in a few others it appeared fully as probable that it was one of the modes in which the disorder had manifested itself.

Moral Causes.—Of the 135 persons in whom the exciting cause appears to have been of a moral or psychical character, there were 112 in whom this might be referred to sorrow, anxiety, and disappointment from various causes. The most prominent of these were anxiety respecting a livelihood, and pecuniary losses, in 31 cases; sorrow from the death of near relatives, in 18; distress from other domestic trials, in 14; and disappointed affections, in 22 cases. The proportion of men was greater under the first of these heads; that of women under the three others.

None of the four cases under the head of anxiety as to the success of business, were connected with large mercantile speculations. It may also be observed, that of the seven persons in whom unhappy conjugal connexions appear to have operated as an exciting cause, three were women, who had married persons not of the Society of Friends.

Excitement connected with religious hopes, fears, and speculations was supposed to have acted as an exciting cause in the case of five, and as a predisposing one in that of nine individuals. It is right to observe, that several of these were persons of rather weak minds. . . .

Of the 615 cases, or whole number admitted, including readmissions, there were 277, or more than 45 per cent. of mania; 215, or nearly 35 per cent., of melancholia; 64, or somewhat more than 10 per cent., of monomania; and 41, or about 8 per cent., of dementia. Of congenital idiocy and imbecility, five cases only have been admitted, in which further mental disorder had not super-

* Though not given in the table, it may be stated as a curious fact that three persons, consisting also of a brother and two sisters, were supposed, by their friends, to have been predisposed to insanity, by being the offspring of first cousins. The parents were respectable, well educated persons, considered more than usually intelligent, and without any known hereditary tendency to insanity. They had a family of one son and seven daughters; and it appeared that, with but one or two exceptions, more or less singularity or weakness existed in such of them as did not actually become insane. The case may be worthy of notice in connexion with the somewhat popular opinion of the undesirableness of such connexions. The marriage of first cousins being of unfrequent occurrence in, and being forbidden by the rules of, the Society of Friends, may account, if the opinion be correct, for these being the only cases of the kind that have occurred at the Retreat.

vened.* This small proportion can only, in a very slight degree, be attributed to the original rule of the institution against the admission of such cases, which was for a very short period, if at all, acted upon.

The relative proportion of cases of mania and monomania was the same for the two sexes; melancholia was 10 per cent. more frequent in females; and dementia was more than twice as frequent in males as in the other sex.

The same acuteness and minute observation is apparent throughout the Report. The liability to relapse after the first recovery is found to have been in men, 27.3 per cent.; in women, 35.50 per cent.; but it is believed that it may be on the average as high as 50 per cent., as second attacks often occur at five, eight, fourteen, and even nineteen years after recovery from the period of the first attack. From the sections descriptive of the internal economy of the Institution, the moral treatment of the patients, and the modes of employment and recreation provided for them, we would gladly have borrowed a long extract; but on the whole, these do not now materially differ from those adopted of late years in other well-managed asylums. Gardening, and agricultural labour are resorted to, with games of skill within doors, and out of doors, cricket and quoits. The food is of good quality, and nearly unrestricted, it being the object to impose no irritating restraint, but to make the patients feel as much as possible at home. Under the head of Medical Treatment, which,

* Two men and five women, in whom mania, and one woman in whom monomania, was superadded to a state of original imbecility bordering upon partial idiocy, have been admitted.

by the way, seems very simple, we find it remarked, that severe antiphlogistic, or reducing measures, are seldom resorted to; and that it has been found, that "where venesection, and other means of the same kind have been carried to a great extent before admission, the recovery has generally been more tedious, and perhaps in some cases prevented."

In cases, however, of various forms in the recent stage, the cautious employment of local bleeding either by leeches or cupping, the use of brisk purgatives and aperients, of evaporating lotions to the head and stimulating pediluvia, followed sometimes by blisters to the nape, has been very frequently attended by decided advantage. Where the physical signs of cerebral disturbance have been more marked, a mild mercurial course with or without opiates, and carried only to incipient ptyalism has, in some cases at least, been speedily followed by convalescence. In cases of mania attended by much excitement, where the general means first mentioned either appeared inapplicable, or when tried, have not been followed by decided relief, the tartarized antimony, in full or nauseating doses, has not unfrequently appeared efficacious in removing the excitement. Preparations of opium, and particularly morphia and Dover's powder, hyosciamus and other sedatives, are likewise frequently and successfully resorted to, in some cases of excitement, with the view of tranquillizing the patient and producing sleep, without being followed by those unpleasant symptoms which were formerly thought to arise from their employment.

The annual publication of Reports, from the books now very generally kept in the more noted Lunatic Asylums, is a good feature in the improved management of such institutions; and in this, as in still greater reforms and improvements, the managers of The Retreat have had the honour to lead the way.

ON THE LATE FIRE IN THE TOWER OF LONDON—WITH SOME REMARKS UPON FIRES IN GENERAL.

BY LUCIFER SWING, ESQ.

"SURELY the obtuse multitude will see by the light of the burning armoury that I am again among them," said I to myself, as I took up a station on Tower Hill, after completing my preparations. "They affected to doubt of my return, notwithstanding the fires which tracked my progress—the burning foot-marks I left behind me—from Devonshire to Bedfordshire. Even the glimpse I allowed the cow-boy, of my Jim-Crow hat when I set fire to farmer Smith's stacks and barns at Shipton was thrown away on their dull intellects. 'Spontaneous combustion—the stuff had been stacked before it was dry.' Stuff, indeed! But they can scarcely call this the consequence of spontaneous combustion: the arms were not stacked in a wet condition. Old Arthur and Gurwood knew their business better than to permit of that."

It soon appeared that I had given the Cockneys credit for more penetration than they really possessed. Among the crowd that flocked to look at the blaze, conjectures were rife enough. One gentleman, who spoke much of his friend Lord Palmerston, and the progress of the Anti-Corn Law cause, hinted that it was a device of the Duke of Wellington, the only sure way to keep the arms out of the hands of the people in the event of a popular insurrection; a Jew Chartist from Houndsditch declared it was the act of some mad Quaker bent upon putting a stop to the Opium war; Boatswain Smith declared it was a special interference of Providence to provide a bonfire about the time of the gun-powder plot, seeing that the new Ministers were speaking the Catholics fair, and were as likely to disregard that sacred anniversary as their predecessors; one emaciated tailor talked about flues overheated; but to do the snobs justice, this view was too common-place even for their Cockney souls, and was scouted by a universal groan of dissent.

Still not one of them seemed to entertain the slightest suspicion of the real author of the "catastrophe," as the eloquent writers in the newspapers have appropriately termed it. There never was a truer remark than that made by my ingenious friend, Mr. Carlyle. (And here let me pause to explain, as my calling a man friend may be productive of disagreeable consequences to the individual so designated in this narrow-minded and prejudiced age. I merely apply the epithet to Mr. C. because glowing descriptions of handiwork, not unlike mine in his history of the French Revolution, show that he possesses a genuine and discriminating taste for the master-pieces of incendiarianism. I am not aware of ever having had the pleasure of shaking hands with him.) To proceed, then, there never was a truer remark made than that elicited from Mr. Carlyle by the close of Danton's history—how impossible a public man finds it to regain his place, if he secedes a moment from the arena. Ten years seem to have rendered the British public as ignorant of the name and deeds of Swing, as if he had never been the one theme of the newspaper press.

They will soon know better. My old friend Peel is in office again,—and here am I too.

During my absence, some bunglers have been trying to take up my trade; but the grace and tranquillity of the master's hand was wanting. Where Swing is at work, the bursting out of the blaze is the first indication of his presence. "Alone I did it." Sometimes the lid of a lucifer-box—a single foot-print—or some such equivocal indication, points suspicion to human agency, but the track can be followed no farther. The stones prate not of my whereabouts. I strike home with the silent speed of the lightning; my path is traceless as the bird's through the air. But the fellows who fired Birmingham and Bristol were coarse, bellowing blockheads, whose collective jolterheads possessed not a tithe of the wit that is in Swing's little finger. No gentleman could tolerate their drunken and riotous noise. The burning of the House of Commons, indeed, made me sensible of a momentary pang of jealousy; but a close investigation has satisfied me that it was the result of accident. It was one of the last blessings bestowed upon the nation by the old Exchequer of sainted memory. That time-hallowed institution was resolved that the old houses in which it took delight should not be profaned by meaner occupants. There are some other old houses which it is bent upon seeing an end of, before it quits this sublunary scene. The Exchequer-bill affair is a mere attempt to throw combustibles into one in Threadneedle Street.

Yes, Peel is in again, and here am I once more! He is a deep one, Bob; and for that matter I myself am not far behind him. He will not tell what he is going to do; and as for my intentions, not a syllable shall pass my lips. Yet we will both of us be busy enough this winter.

My coup d'essai will, I think, be admitted to have been respectable for one whose hand has been out of practice for the last ten years. The fires at South Melton, in Devonshire, were nothing to speak of; scintillations of the same enthusiasm which made Ferdinand Count Fathom cast himself on the earth at his first landing, crying, "Old England, I have thee fast." The Warwickshire blaze was simply one of those irresistible impulses which seize the Irishman at Donnybrook, on feeling the shillela in his hand. "I could not help it, though he were my own father," says Pat, as he knocks down whoever is next him. To tell the truth, I feel rather ashamed of these little exuberances, and will thank my friends not to speak of them. An ordinary man might be vain of being able to effect them; but Swing ought to have been great enough to have refrained from such things. My courses should have been, (and such really was my intention,) to have made at once for London, and burst upon the public with the firing of the Tower. But my fingers itched to be at work again as I passed along. Human nature is frail:—the bridegroom, left alone with his bride, is pardoned although he cannot refrain from snatching a kiss till the ceremony is fairly over; and my incontinence of burning will likewise, I trust, be excused, seeing that it is not defended.

As to the effect of my real debut, I feel quite at ease: no one can deny its merits. The silent admiration of the assembled multitude bespoke the masterpiece. There has not been such an exciting event witnessed in that neighbourhood for many a day. The execution of old Lovat and the rest of the Jacobites was nothing to it. The only thing in authentic history, indeed, that comes near it was the bold snatch at the crown by my maternal ancestor, Colonel Blood, whom my friends, when they are pleased to flatter me, say I somewhat resemble in face and figure. The interest excited by his brief silent scuffle was quite equal to that produced by my illumination, though different in kind. Perhaps, if anything, his romance was more purely tragic;—the human interest was all in all;—there was something melo-dramatic, I confess, in the effect of mine. The truth is, that each was obliged to defer in some measure to the spirit of his age: the taste of his times was more severely classical: in ours a more florid style is not only tolerated but called for.

Much has been done since Blood's day to lend a prosaic character to the purlieus of the Tower. The late Armoury itself, as one of the first, was one of the most glaring: it was a stone-and-lime incarnation of the Dutch spirit of its finisher, King William, intruding among the memories of the Plantagenets. It was a store-house from the banks of the Amstel stuck up alongside of the Norman keep. And every building around the Tower had been modernized and made common-place. The Mint and the Trinity-House are snug citizen-like boxes; to say nothing of the old clothes shops in Postern Row. Steam-boats are moored opposite the Traitor's Gate. Where St. Catherine's Chapel and Hermitage once stood is now a dock: the old carved wood of the sanctuary is sacrilegiously transferred to a toy-shop kind of modern Gothic chapel in the Regent's Park. The Tower and its purlieus have been vulgarized down to the level of the gaping Cockneys who follow the beef-eaters from the Horse Armoury to the Jewel House.

I have given one stirring night to the dotage of the old pile. The inmates of Wapping and Shadwell were roused by the blaze; still shivering from the damps the late inundation left behind, they were struck aghast by the lurid glare of a more destructive element. The dark masses in the vicinity of Tooley Street were lighted up. The mud of Thames Street and Billingsgate gleamed red as blood. The unwonted light penetrated the recesses of Houndsditch, and the labyrinth of narrow winding pestilential lanes beyond; and the assembled blackguardism of these filthy regions came trooping to gaze on the spectacle. It was a terrific moment, when four hundred feet of roof crashed in at once, and a whirlwind of smoke and flame rushed roaring out with solid blazing rafters floating on it as if it were water! The dullest imagination pictured to itself the scene within the battle-mented and barricaded space. In fearful proximity to the blaze,—its wood-work scorching and crackling from the heat,—rose the White Tower, in which tons of gunpowder were stored. Across the narrow area between, men were hurrying the regalia of England, to deposit it in a place of security. The Ordnance Survey—the fruits of the scientific toil of years; the records of the early monarchy of England—the history of the cradled childhood of that mighty state which now girdles the globe with its possessions, were shrivelling in the proximity of the fiery tongues licking the outer walls within which they were deposited. Not more startlingly unexpected and destructive was the reawakening of Vesuvius from beneath the vines covering the supposed extinct volcano, when Pompeii was whelmed, than this conflagration was or might become. But though no one was ignorant of the possible danger, no one moved from the scene in consequence. There was in that intensely burning, seventy-times-seven-times-heated fiery furnace, a fascination beyond that of the serpent's gaze. Of all the prostitutes and pickpockets of a neighbourhood containing much of the lowest degradation of London,—of those valiant to their Maker and cowardly towards man, who are callous to every crime, yet tremble before the thief-catcher,—not one sought to steal away from the danger which all knew to be imminent. Their imbruted souls were reawakened for the moment,—they were alive to the terrible grandeur of the scene; and the attendant peril only heightened the thrill which quickened even their dull sense.

And was I not proud of my handiwork? It is characteristic of the highest order of genius to derive a satisfaction from the contemplation of the effects of its own power, far beyond what inferior minds derive from all the applause that can be heaped upon them. Scott felt this when, from beneath the mantle of anonymity, the "Great Unknown" saw and heard the impression made by his writings. A more perfect incarnation of that power which, satisfied with the consciousness that it has done, seeks not to be known, existed in the mysterious Junius. But what was the effect of either of their works compared with mine? I flitted from group to group, and with the unconstrained freedom which throws down all barriers of non-acquaintance at such a moment, I learned from the unconscious exclamations of each, what impression my work had made upon them. To kindle a soul under the ribs of physical death is a trifle—I had kindled a soul under the ribs of moral death,—I had created, for the moment, imagination and the power of braving death, to gratify the emotion, in the very outcasts of society. A greater than Scott or Junius was among them, speaking to them,—and not one of them suspected with whom they had the honour of conversing.

Oh, yes, if the public will but give Peel and me time, they "shall see what they shall see." We are men of deeds, not words. This winter, under our joint auspices, will yield something for the men of future generations to talk of at their firesides, though we are not going to spoil the effect of what we have in store by prating of it beforehand. By simply preventing men from interfering with the elements which are fermenting, he will produce such effects! Want of employment and cold and hunger will do their work, and my torch will add the finishing grace. I say nothing; but, though some may think that, like an injudicious dramatist, I have expended all my strength in my opening scene, they shall confess their mistake before I have done. Monk Lewis's Abellino—the boy Jones himself—have not a tithe of my power of insinuating myself unseen into places where access seems impossible without detection; and when I disappear, more lasting memorials of my disappearance than a "melodious twang and strong smell of sulphur" are left behind.

It may appear incautious in one, of whose fate, if apprehended, there can be little doubt, to throw out such hints regarding his personal appearance as are contained in the allusions made above to my Jim-Crow hat and my likeness to Colonel Blood; but the truth is, I bear a charmed life. Many a man (and woman too) can tell how they have met me at an ordinary—in the theatre—in a stage-coach—in many and diverse places. They have conversed with me, quite confident that I was some person they knew all about; yet they felt quite at their ease; and it was only after I had taken my leave, that the veil was removed from their eyes, and they recollected it was I whom they had been conversing with all the time. They know it—they can swear it—they cannot account for their forgetfulness; and the next time we meet, it will be as before. After I am gone, they bethink themselves of applying to the police; but no one but themselves has noticed me—no one can tell what way I went—and they only get laughed at for their pains by those whose fancied superior sense they know to be nothing but greater ignorance.

Once, and once only, have I felt an uneasy sense of being in danger of detection. A policeman, while the armoury was burning, saw,—as the police-reports, in the daily papers, can testify,—"a gentlemanly man, like a foreigner," hustled by a knot of pickpockets, who had taken a shirt-pin from him. The magistrate, honest man, marvelled sore next day that the "foreign-looking" gentleman did not appear to prosecute. The policeman, I will be bound, knows why,—and execrates his stupidity in not recognising, till too late, the rich prey he has allowed to escape him. It might have been productive of disagreeable consequences had I ventured within the verge of a police-court; and yet I was loath to lose that pin—that gage d'amour— which a fair writer of fashionable novels might, perhaps, recognise, if she saw it.

The most eminent men have, and have had, their weaknesses. Mine is a lurking desire to have it admitted that there is nothing forbidding in my external appearance. My cousin Rock—I expect to hear some of these days that he, too, has reappeared—we are connected through the family of the Bloods,—he comes as near me in most respects as an Irishman can to an Englishman,—has the same foible. It is very silly, I confess, but it would give me sincere pleasure, if any of the many persons with whom I have enjoyed these occasional interviews, would have the candour to state that they have found Captain Swing a quiet, gentlemanly, conversable sort of person—not unlike the Eidolon of the author of Waverley, as he appeared to Dr. Dryasdust: I would not willingly be confounded with fellows like Jonathan Wild.

N.B.—I had no hand in the blaze at Guildhall. Indeed, no judicious incendiary will attempt that building: the dullness of the speeches at civic feasts has impregnated every timber with an unignitable quality—a far greater security against fire than Kyan's patent against dry rot. The Thames may be set on fire, but Guildhall never.

THE EMIGRANT'S FAREWELL TO EDINBURGH.

THE Earth is drest in leafy June;
'Mid fleecy banners white
The Sun rides through the azure noon:
But in my heart 'tis night.
The blackbird from the wood doth pour
His mellow-throated troll,
But like the pewit o'er the moor
To wail my desert soul
This heavy day!

Flow freely, tears!—I will not stay
The tide that Nature sends;
These tears ye have (my all to-day)
Whom I have left, my friends.
I vowed to bear a manly heart,
And like a rock to stand;
But, oh! 'tis hard in one to part
From friend and fatherland,
As I this day!

Farewell, Dun-Edin's castled seat,
Dear, and thou, dearer still,
Where oft we clomb blithe May to greet,
The lion-crouching hill!
And the high crags, where we did walk
Bewondering the rocks,
And of pent fires wove learned talk,
And terrible earthquake shocks
'Fore Adam's day!

Farewell, green Pentland's pastoral braes,
The rock, the scour, the glens,
The burn that wimples many ways
Sweet through the furzy dens!
And many a peak where Boreas snorts,
And I would climb with glee,
Blessing our chain of mountain forts
That make us bold and free,
And strong as they!

Farewell, thou beauty-skirted Firth,
With glancing islets spotted;
Farewell, thou land of wealth and mirth,
With busy cities dotted.
Ban thee who will, and stay at home,
The coldest, bleakest, barest;
But force him, Fate, abroad to roam,
He'll bless thee, freshest, fairest,
As I this day!

Farewell, the homes that I have known,
The skies that I have loved,
Each heart that I have called mine own,
Each friend that I have proved!
Farewell, and if the Heavens be kind,
A better-omened oar
Shall speed me back from arid Ind,
To my green native shore,
Some future day!

J. S. B.

THE OLD ENGLISH GENTLEMAN.*

CONSIDERING the fondness of the English for Field Sports, it is somewhat surprising that the Novel, which is now employed for every conceivable purpose, has never yet been pressed into the service of the sylvan war. In one or two novels there is a considerable admixture of the Turf and the Chase; but "The Old English Gentleman" is, so far as we recollect, the first romance of which woodcraft, in all its varied aspects and kinds, forms the leading theme. There are, to be sure, the usual complement of young ladies and their lovers; but Tom Bolton, the old Whipper-in; Peter Bumstead, the Game-keeper; and Striver, the veteran Trapper and former Huntsman; with their favourite hounds and terriers, are the true heroes,—to whom Squire Scourfield, the Old English Gentleman, and his son-in-law eldest, Ashley Wilmott, though keen and born sportsmen, are but secondary. The dogs are even greater characters than their masters. The solitary trapper's pet terrier and constant companion, Button, does all but speak. Thus the freshness and raciness of the subject, and the ease and mastery with which it is treated, combine to render "The Old English Gentleman" a delightful picture of the English manners of, we fear, a past day, as well as a charming novel. The mere novel, its plot, mysteries, love-passages, and denouement, we leave, fresh and untouched, to the curiosity of the reader, limiting ourselves to its sporting scenes and characters.

All its best scenes are rural, sylvan, and out-of-doors, or by the snug and smiling hearths of

The cottage-homes of England;

nor, from its pages, could one guess that there is, in all England, either unwise and oppressive game laws, swinging, extreme poverty, or alienation and heartburning between castes and classes.

* Three volumes. By John Mills, Esq. of Braudeston Hall. London: Colburn.

Yet is the outline, and even the filling-in of the picture of the Squire, his family, and his dependents, as faithful as it is animated. We have only to wish that such scenes were more generally to be met with; the Squire Scourfields being, we apprehend, as rare in these times as the Sir Roger de Coverleys, whom they so closely resemble. Yet is their beau idéal worth depicting, from the unmingled pleasure which its contemplation affords, and perhaps from the stimulus which it may supply to a few country gentlemen to "go and do likewise."

Squire Scourfield is too exclusively a sportsman to be a perfect exemplar to the enlightened, modern, English landlord; yet there are about him many excellent points, in which more intellectual and accomplished landlords are often found lamentably deficient. In the Squire, a pure and hearty kindness of nature atones for every other want. Yet is he, as a personage, and as a creation of the author's fancy, very inferior, as we have stated, to his hereditary followers in the field.

Another object with the author is to display his own knowledge of Field Sports, for the entertainment and instruction of the uninitiated, and especially the inhabitants of cities. He lays no claim to the character of a novelist, but he does presume to think that he possesses some title to be considered a bit of a sportsman. We can only say, that a real sportsman has a far better chance of drawing a correct and animated picture of such scenes and characters as those that furnish forth the Old English Gentleman, than any novelist whatever, who knows little beyond his books.

The story opens finely with a view of the Old Whipper-in; who, save that there has been a Natty Bumpo, a Leather-stocking, would be a character as original, as it is one well-conceived, and well-sustained.

It was a cold, comfortless night in December. The wind swept over the heath, whistling through the woods in sudden gusts, accompanied by sleet and rain, as Tom Bolton, the old whipper-in, sat in his "snuggery," as he called his cottage, before a log fire, blazing cheerfully upon the hearth. The rain battered against the windows with a chilling sound, and the old man continued to heap fresh wood upon the fire, until the little room was warmed and illuminated to his heart's content. "There, that's as it should be," exclaimed he, stretching out his legs, and filling the bowl of a short pipe.

Tom Bolton's hair was thin, and the many winters that had passed since he was a "feather weight" had frosted the few remaining locks. Threescore and seven years numbered his age; but the health of youth glowed in his rubicund visage, and strength was still in his sinewy and well-moulded limbs. Time had not frozen his blood, or weakened his voice, if it had thinned his hair. Still to him the dashing leap and high-mettled horse were the same objects of fearless attraction and delight; still his voice rung merrily through copse and cover, as he cheered his darling pack; and, for many miles round Woodland Hall, Squire Scourfield's old whipper-in was frequently the subject of the fox-hunters' toast, and even of the ladies' admiration.

The old man puffed cloud after cloud, watching with upturned face each succeeding volume of smoke as it rolled along the ceiling. Occasionally, he glanced at a capacious china bowl, in which was a fawn-handled silver ladle. It was empty; but near it was placed some lemons and a knife, and upon a half-consumed log himself a small kettle of boiling-water. An old clock, that had been tick-tacking for half a century and upwards, in a corner of the room, struck nine; and after the carved representative of a bird had "cuckoo'd" for a minute before the dial, Tom rose from his easy position, and, pulling away a chequered curtain before the window, peered through the wet-streaked panes. The night was dark and gloomy; the water streamed from the roof and pattered on the ground; the rain beat against the glass; and, excepting an occasional whine of discontent from an old hound chained in the yard, nothing else could be heard.

"Where can Will be! I don't hear him coming," said the old man, returning to his chair. "Courting, as usual," continued he, knocking the ashes from his pipe, and exhibiting signs of increasing impatience.

In a few minutes, footsteps quickly approaching attracted his attention. The hound barked loudly, when a voiced hallooed, "Down, Rangler, down, I say!" which instantly silenced him.

"Here he comes," said the old man with a smile, which was immediately changed into an awkward frown. The latch of the door flew up, and into the room bounced a young man, dripping with wet from head to foot. He appeared about twenty-eight years of age, and was very athletic; his features were so similar to those of the old man that no one could doubt the relationship existing between them.

"Well, governor," said he, shaking the water from his hat, and throwing off a great-coat from his broad shoulders, "here I am, you see."

"And you might have been here before, I think," replied his father, "and not come tailing in this fashion. Always be a leader, Will, not a tail-hound."

"So I am, dad; thanks to your whip," rejoined Will, seizing the lemons and cutting them in halves. "Ask Fanny whether she doesn't think me the first fellow in the county," added he, with a comical look at his father, and stopping in the act of paring a lemon.

"William Bolton, my son," said the old man gravely, "women are women. Fanny Chatterton's a woman. Many a man's been hung through a woman. I need say no more upon the subject. Mix the liquor."

Will laughed heartily at this speech, and resumed his employment. In a short time the mingled ingredients steamed fragrantly from the bowl, and, as Will stirred them about, his father's olfactory nerves seemed excited.

"That smells prime," said he, regarding the prepared beverage admiringly.

"You're like Chanter, governor," replied Will.

"What, upon the right scent, eh?" added the old man.

After a few "fancy stirs" by Will, as the old man called them, he filled an old-fashioned horn, mounted with silver, and handed it to his father.

"There, governor, taste that," said he.

The old man took the proffered flagon, and, after surveying its contents, said, "Here's the squire's health—God bless him!"

"Amen," rejoined Will, draining one of like appearance and dimensions.

After the toast, Will dragged a chair opposite to his father, and, settling himself in as pleasant an attitude as possible, said,

"I hope I shall give satisfaction in my new calling, governor."

"Of course you will, if you follow my directions," replied the old man, taking his pipe slowly from his lips, and placing it on the table. By this movement Will saw that he was about to receive a lecture.

"As whip under me," continued his father, "all that you did was a copy of the original; there was no doubt or fear of doing wrong, because you only, as I may say, echoed what you knew to be right. I ain't a proud man, my son; but I may as well say, for it's God's truth, that 'tis as unnatural for me to be out concerning all about hounds, as 'tis for you not to wink your left eye at every pretty girl you meet."

"Ha, ha, ha!" roared Will.

The conversation proceeds in the same strain, until the potent beverage being fairly brewed, the senior proceeds to indoctrinate the young man with the principles of the important duties about to devolve on him as huntsman.

"Now Striver's pensioned off upon the property, to snare fitchews and weasels for amusement, you've the first place in the squire's establishment. To-morrow," said the old man in an important voice, "you take possession of the kennel. Think of the position for a moment. A young man on the sunny side of thirty, huntsman to Squire Scourfield's pack of crack hounds! Why, it's a better place than the Lord Chancellor's, Will; at any rate, a better one for you. Now, mark my words—it's the last time that I shall give ye my opinion as to your duties, because, as you enter upon them to-morrow, it wouldn't sound musical for the whipper-in to be instructing the huntsman in his work. It wouldn't be regular. Fill up your horn. Now listen. Activity—"

"What hound was that, father!" asked Will, with a suppressed laugh.

"Out with your nonsense," said the old man, pettishly; "activity is the first indispensable for the huntsman to a pack of foxhounds. Before he goes into the kennel, he should determine, according to his judgment, the number to be drafted for the country that he is going to hunt, which will vary according to its description. Never be in a hurry, Will, at drafting; it's no easy matter to draft hounds properly.—Then, at the meet, be to your exact time, if possible; but never before your time. In most other things, you had better be a little before than after; but never at the meet; it's against all rule.—As you go into cover, be silent, and, while your hounds are drawing, place the gentlemen so that the fox can't go off unseen. Some huntsmen don't like to ask a gentleman to stand sentinel; but it's a necessary part of fox-hunting.—When you're coming out of cover, then give it them, Will. Make the hills ring with your hearty voice; let every hound hear the 'hark, for'ard,' so that it will make his heart leap with joy: not in that tone as if a rabbit had made a break of it instead of a fox.—At all times, keep your hounds for'ard; they will tire on a cold scent. When they are stopped by sheep, or any thing else, help them, for very often they'll hunt the old scent back again, if they can hunt no other. When they're at fault, don't be in a hurry to make your cast. Let them have time to hit off the scent themselves; but, if they can't do it, make your cast wide and for'ard, and be sure that it's a perfect one before you try another.—When you are running a fox, the scent bad, and the fox a long way before, without having been pressed, if he should be making for strong earths that are open, or for large covers full of game, take off the hounds at the first fault they come to; the fox will go many miles to your one, and, in all probability, will run you out of all scent.—Where the vermin are plenty, you must be careful not to run the heel; for hounds can run, sometimes, the wrong way of the scent better than they can the right, where one is up the wind, and t'other down. Lift your tail-hounds, and get 'em to the rest; but be cautious that you don't lift any for'ard before the others; it's dangerous, and very clumsy work.—But the most difficult of all that you've got to do is to learn the difference between one scent and another, and to know with certainty that of your hunted fox. This requires a nose, and a judgment above the heads of most men. Few can comprehend the art, and it's one that can be learned only with practice; but you'll hit it off, Will, by and by, I know."

"Hope I shall, governor," said Will; "but you must be getting dry with your long stretch; come, wet your whistle."

Tom proceeds with his maxims and rules, which we presume are thoroughly scientific. He is here and elsewhere peculiarly great on the philosophy of scent. But Old Tom has other ideas in his head, though how they got into the noddle of a Christian whipper-in, it is not easy to guess. Perhaps the medium was the spiced ale.

"It's a bitter cold night; 'faith I think it a fair excuse for a little more warm comfort. Come, spice up some ale, and clap it on the fire, Will."

With ready hand, Will obeyed the order, by filling the bright kettle with "the blood of Sir John Barley-corn," and adding to it nutmeg, cloves, sugar, and a crust of brown bread. The concomitants soon hissed and steamed fragrantly upon the bright embers, which caused a second edition of twitching from the old man's organ of smell.

"What, again!" exclaimed Will, "why you're as game as old Merryman was."

"Ay, he was a tearer," said the old man with enthusiasm.

"An out-an'-outer," continued Will.

"I shan't put my eyes upon his like, that's my belief, without I see his spirit again," rejoined the old man seriously.

"His what!" exclaimed Will, stopping with surprise, in the act of pouring the prepared beverage into a flagon.

"His spirit, I say," replied his father. "But, go on, my boy, that stuff smells uncommon nice."

In accordance with his wish, the savoury mixture was conveyed to the palate of the old man, and, after being pronounced "excellent," he took his tobacco-box from a capacious pocket in his scarlet coat, which he always wore, and commenced filling his pipe a second time.

"Instead of smoking, governor, I wish you'd say what you mean by seeing Merryman's spirit again," said Will. "One would suppose that you had seen it already."

"So I have, my boy," replied his father.

"Have you, though!" exclaimed Will, a disbeliever in ghosts, hobgoblins, and all sorts of immaterial things, through which "the moon shines unchecked."

"The fact is, my son," slowly said the old man, with a contemplative look at the white-washed ceiling, and a smack of his lips, which is often a demonstration of self-importance, "I've my own particular notions as to spirits, and such like. Why shouldn't there be ghosts of dead monkeys, as well as dead mortals, I should like to know! A man isn't a more wonderful beast than a monkey, and both are damned rascals generally, to say the best of them. Some people, particularly parsons, pretend to say that when a monkey 'turns his toes up to the roots of the daisies,' there's an end of him. Stuff o' nonsense! There's no end to anything. The old bricks and mortar are worked fresh into other buildings, after this fashion: monkeys become Christians, being next to human nature, and Christians, as tops of the tree, again become hay-seed, or cabbage-plants—that is to say, their shells, or outsides so alter—their spirits may be disposed of differently; but I think they accompany the carcase or vegetable, as the case may be."

"Why, governor, you're not a Christian," said Will.

"The Archbishop of York couldn't prove that he was a better," rejoined the old man. "Deal as you would be dealt by, is my religion. Isn't that Christian?"

"Yes; but that isn't enough to make a man a thorough-bred 'un," replied Will.

"Quite enough, my son, William Bolton, quite enough; for, if we act towards others as we wish them to act towards us, there'll be no screw loose, no wrong meant, you may depend; and that's all that can be expected from the best of Christians."

Tom, over his ale, relates the history of one of his grandest fields, a noble fox-hunt, in which Merryman met his fate, and died as he had lived, gloriously—as Tom thus relates.

Six feet in the thicket lay poor old Merryman and the fox, dead and stiff. Both had run their lives out at the same time. The gay old hound's teeth had not touched the fox; he had not been mouthed, but died, as the hound did, with the race alone.

A white frost had crisped the skins of the two matchless fellows, and the rays of the morning sun glittered upon their frozen coats as I looked at them with a quivering lip and tearful eyes. For six years he had been the favourite. I was with him the first time that he sung his song as a cub, and from that moment when his cry rung he never was at fault. Poor old fellow! There he was, stretched upon the ground, dead; never could his note again make our hearts leap, as it used when he gave his signal for reynard to unkennel.

But those who do not see Merryman living, cannot sympathize with Tom in his death. Merryman and the fox had disappeared together, after all the other dogs had given in from fatigue; and in the course of the night, previous to his being found dead beside the fox, his ghost had been seen by the whipper-in and the whole kennel. Tom had been awakened in the night by a strange noise among the frightened hounds. He found them all

Huddled together like a flock of frightened sheep, and they kept crying just as if the cord was being put upon 'em. To tell the truth, I felt somewhat queer at this, and my voice didn't seem so firm as usual, when I hollowed out for them to be quiet. In a short time I managed to get peace, and then I tried to find out the reason of all this rumpus. I looked here and there to no purpose, and began to think that a hound had broke out in his dream, which set the others on; when, turning to the ailing-ground, I saw, as plain as I now see you, old Merryman standing in the pale light of the moon, with his bushy tail fanning to and fro, and his sleek ears thrown back upon his neck, as was his custom when pleased. Not thinking of the impossibility of his return, I called the old fellow to me, delighted and surprised at seeing him; but there he remained, wagging his tail and looking at me. I walked two or three steps towards him, when he glided away into the mist, gradually fading from my sight, till he disappeared altogether, just as the first light of morning broke.

"What do you say, father, as to the ghost of Merryman that appeared to you?"

"What do I say!" repeated the old man. "Why, that it was his spirit come to warn me of his death, to be sure."

"Did you never see it again?" inquired his son.

"Never, my boy, never," was the reply.

"What do you think became of it?" said Will.

"Why, as to that, I can't say exactly. But I shouldn't wonder, when I reflect," said the old man, pressing a finger upon his brow, "that the spirit of old Merryman may be in his son, the puppy Trimbush."

Such was Tom Bolton; and from him we turn to his master's mansion, and household, which are equally perfect in their kind.

Scurfield Hall never looked more beautiful than at sunrise on the fourteenth of February, in the year of our Lord 18—. The gray mist rose slowly from the green turf, and hung upon the river in dense folds, as if reluctant to part with its more genial element. The old dark Elizabethan building was just tinged with the faint streaks of the rising sun, and the ivy-clad porch sparkled in the light, as the dew-wet leaves were shaken in the passing breeze. The rooks wheeled from the lofty elms which shaded the building, and "cawed" their matin orisons with praiseworthy observance. A robin perched upon a blackthorn warbled his wild strain; and a woodpigeon, roused by the sound from his sluggish repose in a cedar-tree, as old as the hills in the distance, whirled from his chosen roost, and sped to his morning meal. A large Newfoundland dog walked leisurely from the entrance, as a maid-servant swung open the massive iron-studded hall-door, and, stretching his shaggy limbs upon the lawn, trotted leisurely off, to flirt with a lady pointer through the rails of her kennel.

The Manor House, as the hall was more generally called, was built in the year 1580, by Sir John Scurfield, who was knighted by the virgin queen, for what service to the crown history doth not record. But two auburn ringlets, quartered in the armorial bearings of the family, gave rise to some county scandal, of the worthy knight having fabricated a cunning wig for his royal mistress in her fading days, which deceived the Earl of Leicester so completely, that he begged two ringlets from it for a locket. This so gratified her gracious majesty, that she dubbed her barber with the honour of knighthood, and granted him the privilege of wearing two ringlets rampant upon his shield.

From generation to generation, the Manor House and splendid estate had passed in a direct line to the heir, without quibble or dispute. No mortgage existed to render the possession of the broad lands but a nominal enjoyment of them; no fine old oaks came crashing to the ground to pay "debts of honour," but stood, as they had done for centuries, towering to the clouds, and stretching forth their time-mossed limbs over the earth that nurtured them, like grateful children protecting their mother.

The building stood upon elevated ground, which, gradually sloping, terminated at the edge of a narrow but rapid stream, about three hundred yards from the hall. A thick grove upon the opposite side formed a capacious rookery, where those cunning ornithological priests reared their progenies undisturbed by powder or bow. Two hundred acres of even turf, dotted with trees of varied foliage, comprised the surrounding park, in which a few aged horses and colts were luxuriating. Upon its borders a dense cover stood, full of thick underbrush. This was the pet one of surly John Bumstead, the game-keeper, and was held more sacred in his estimation than the village church.

The old house, without being magnificent from ornamental architecture, was remarkable for its venerable and solid appearance. Of the Gothic order, its thick walls were braced with huge beams, and its two wings were flanked with turrets. In the centre of the building was a large stone porch, over which the arms were rudely carved. A massive oak door, studded with iron nails, swung at the end of it, which led to the entrance hall. This was so capacious, that the squire used to say he had once, in his young wild days, driven his tandem in, and turned it round without touching the walls.

It was about six o'clock, when a window was thrown open, and a head emerged. A smile spread gradually over the features as the pleasant scene was regarded, and a voice exclaimed, as two hands were brought suddenly together with a loud crack:—

"Here's a delicious St. Valentine's morning!"

"The squire's up, by Jennies!" said a large fat red-faced boy, immediately under the window, stopping in the act of digging up a flower-root.

"Jack Tiggie, what are you doing there? At some mischief, I'm sure," said the voice from the window.

"If you please, sir, I—I—I ain't, sir," replied Jack somewhat confused.

"You young stoat! stop where you are," was the reply.

But the order was unheeded. Away ran the boy as fast as he could go, when the head was withdrawn.

In a few moments the squire issued from the porch, with a long-thonged whip in his hand. When he perceived the fugitive flying through the shrubbery, he smacked the whip loudly, and with a good-tempered laugh said, "That boy's always at some mischief or other."

The squire's costume was one that may still occasionally be seen worn by "fine old English gentlemen,"—who, in their way, are great exquisites. His hat, or his "thatch," as he was wont to call it, was rather low in the crown, with a brim of extensive dimensions. A few yards of snow-white cambric were curled round his neck with scrupulous care. His long waisted coat, with its broad skirt and bright gilt buttons, had as much care bestowed upon its "cut" as any one of Beau Brummel's. A light buff waistcoat, rounded at the hips, descended far upon a pair of spotless buckskin anti-continuations, and a pair of highly-polished top-boots completed the attire.

The white hair, which peeped in relief under the broad brim, indicated that the squire might have seen the summers and winters of more than half a century; but his dark blue, clear eyes, even white teeth, and unwrinkled countenance, occasioned an observer to question the accuracy of time's index.

Peter Bumstead, the gamekeeper, has a passing interview with the squire, and then the little post-boy comes galloping up upon his Shetland pony, and the squire receives the daily letter-bag; and his beautiful daughter and only child Kate, and his lovely niece Agnes, are made happy by love-letters; and the maid-servants receive a heap of the same kind; and then there are affectionate morning greetings, and warm salutes, and breakfast is hastened, as the sportsmen "threw off at ten." The meal was eaten in the squire's hunting parlour, which was decorated completely in his own taste.

Cross-bows, fowling-pieces, fishing-rods, whips, and nets, were suspended upon pegs in motley groups round the apartment. Portraits of favourite horses and dogs were crowded upon the walls. Foxes' heads, mounted as silver goblets, and a few racing cups, won by some successful horse, were placed upon a sideboard. Altogether, it was a complete sportsman's repository.

The squire was carving a huge sirloin of beef, by the side of which stood a foaming jug of ale, as the girls entered. He was clasped round the neck by both at the same time, and submitted to a process of long and vigorous salutation, with much apparent satisfaction.

"Ye young lads," exclaimed the squire, "what were those letters about, eh?"

The two girls laughed, but returned no answer.

"I know," continued the squire, "some of Ashley's and his ladylike friends' nonsense. They'll be here directly."

"Would you like to hear some of the nonsense, father? or can you place sufficient confidence in my proverbial discretion?" said Kate, archly.

"Don't bother me with the stuff," replied her father. "I wonder that a fellow like Wilmott should deal in such trifles: a fine chap like him. As to Mr. Titley—that young milliner—"

The further progress of the squire's speech was stopped short by Agnes jumping up and placing her hand over his lips.

"Not another word, if you please, uncle," said she. "I am Mr. Titley's champion."

"I am de-light-ed to hear such a honey-dew declaration," said the object of the remark, Powis Titley, suddenly appearing close to her elbow.

Ashley Wilmott is the accepted lover of the squire's heiress; and Titley, his old school-fellow and bosom friend, the admirer of Agnes. The progress of the latter gentleman, from an affected delicate coxcomb, though with many good points, into a man who can follow the hounds like a man, and take a flying leap, is amusing, yet quite in nature. Wilmott is of a higher strain; a piece of absolute perfection indeed, yet not tiresome. Imagine a young man, tall, athletic, finely moulded; with very handsome features, fine clear-blue flashing eyes, a lofty brow, luxuriant chestnut locks, frank, generous, proud, high-minded, and everything else that is admirable; and then suppose him examining a horse trotted out for his inspection by a horse-dealer in the squire's park, who, if not so attractive, is at least a much more rare and amusing person in a book than most heroes, and for this reason preferred by us to Mr. Mill's beau idéal of a young English Country Gentleman, Mr. Wilmott.

"Well, my boy! what do you think of him?" said the squire to Wilmott, as he dropped a fore-foot after inspecting it.

"What does he think of him?" repeated the horse-dealer, a small, long-waisted, bandy-legged individual, dressed in a cutaway green coat, corduroy knees, and antiquated top-boots, with broad pieces of white tape passed across his knees, to keep them in place. "What does he think of him, Squire Scourfield! why what every gen'l'm'n must think that knows anything about a 'oss. There ain't his match, his equal, or his superior," said he, with the prevailing modesty of his craft.

"What can he do?" said Wilmott, after exchanging salutations with the squire, and whispering to him that the horse promised well.

"Do!" repeated the dealer, with emphasis, and putting his turned-up hat on one side, "why, to be short and sweet, gen'l'men, he can do this—he can walk a little, trot a few, and, as for jumping—d—n my eyes—"

"Have you any objection to my riding him to-day?" said Wilmott.

"None whatsoever, sir. He's as sound as a roach, fine as a lark, and devoid of flaw or blemish. A regular pip of the right fruit," replied the horse-dealer, giving the object of his admiration a loud smack upon the neck.

"Take him to the stables, then, and have him saddled," said the squire, "for here come the hounds, I see."

Under four large oaks growing close together in the centre of the park, the appointed place for "the meet," were several mounted horsemen in the gay dress of the chase. Others were walking their horses leisurely towards the spot from various directions. A few horses were being led by servants, and some peasants were hurrying thither with their best haste.

In a few minutes, the hounds, led by William, and followed by his father, passed close to the window of the breakfast-parlour. In an instant the sash was thrown up, and William, and the young ladies' especial favourite, his father, doffed their caps respectfully, as their young mistresses made their appearance.

"How beautiful your hounds look, Mr. Bolton," said Kate to the old whipper-in, knowing the most ready way to please him.

"Thank ye kindly, miss," replied Tom, "they're all in tidy condition."

"What is the name of the leader now?" asked Agnes.

A glow spread over Tom's features, as if his heart was shining through them. He tightened his curb-rein, drew his heels towards his horse's flanks, and performed a very showy curvet, as he bawled, "Trim-bush! I say, Trim-bush!"

A large hound came bounding along from the pack, which continued to proceed with the huntsman, and leaped to the pommel of the saddle. His ears were long and pendulous, his chest deep, back broad, neck thin, his shoulders well thrown back, and a long bushy tail he carried like a soldier's plume. His colour was snowy white, patched with black in different parts of his body.

"This is him, ma'am; the youngest, but a leash in the whole of 'em," said Tom, pulling one of the hound's long ears affectionately as he rested his round feet upon his doe-skins. "He's a son of poor old Merryman," continued he, "and so much like the father in all respects, that I've no doubt in my own mind but—"

Mr. Bolton smiled, lugged the favourite's ear rather too violently, which caused him to squeal, and hesitated to conclude the sentence.

"But, what?" asked Kate.

"You'd only laugh at me, ladies; so I'd rather not," replied Tom, touching the peak of his velvet cap, bending slightly forward in his stirrups, and cantering off with Trim-bush.

"I wonder what he meant!" said Kate.

"Oh! one of his queer notions, I suppose," replied Wilmott. "He's a strange old fellow, but one of the best in the world."

The cockney, or milksop sportsman, is held up to ridicule in the person of Titley, who, at first, falls into all manner of blunders and mishaps; and who, mistaking a squirrel for a fox, sings out, "Tilly-hoo!" and misleads the whole field.

"Tilly-hoo! tilly-hoo! Tilly-ho-oo-oo!" came in a clear, thin voice, from some novice, with the view halloo. "For'ard! for'ard!" shouted William, as he swept towards the spot from whence the welcome sounds proceeded, with a few of the crack-hounds.

"Hark for'ard! hark for'ard!" hallooed Tom. "For'ard, Trimbush! for'ard!" said he to his favourite, who showed extraordinary symptoms of disobeying the order.

When the old whipper-in arrived at the place where the halloo came from, he was surprised at seeing Titley, with his glass to his eye, chanting Tilly-hoo! in a most persevering style. An assertion that "A post sometimes points out the right road," escaped the lips of Tom Bolton, as he perceived the source of intelligence.

"He'll go for Blackwood," said one.

"Ten to one, he goes for Rington pits," shouted another.

"The wind's wrong," replied a third. "He's for Wordaleys covers."

"Now for a rattling burst, and no checks," said Wilmott, flushed with excitement.

"Put him to it, my boy," said the squire, arranging himself comfortably in the saddle for the start.

The willing hounds galloped to and fro, snuffing the ground with distended nostrils; but no joyful cry escaped them. William stood in his stirrups, and, stooping forward, cap in hand, cheered the astonished hounds to pick up the scent.

"Trimbush! Trimbush!" said Tom, in a reproachful tone. The hound stood still from his task, and, looking at the old whipper-in with ears thrown back, wagged his bushy tail.

"No fox has been here, I'll swear," ejaculated Tom.

"I beg you will not impeach my veracity," said Titley.

"Ugh!" replied Tom, signifying his contempt.

"Where did he break from?" inquired Ashley.

"From under that fir-tree, opposite to you, the creature jumped out," replied Titley.

"Point out the exact spot," said the squire.

"Why, bless my destiny! there the thing is now!" replied Titley.

"Where? where? where?" everybody cried.

"There," replied he, pointing to the topmost branch of a lofty elm close at hand.

The bewildered sportsmen looked in the direction. With his bushy tail curled over his back sat a squirrel, peering at the scene below with evident satisfaction that he was above all danger.

"There it is," said Titley, "I knew him by his tail."

Roars of laughter pealed from the majority at this discovery. Wilmott could scarcely keep himself in the saddle, and was literally convulsed with mirth at his friend, who soon found that he had made the woeful blunder of taking a squirrel for a fox. The squire looked at Titley with inexpressible contempt. His eyes appeared ready to start from their sockets. His lips were separated, and his visage, always tolerably flushed, was a bright scarlet from inward laughter.

But there were a few who considered the mistake anything but a subject for mirth. Among the leading male-contents was the old whipper-in. He gazed with lowering brow, which continued to blacken, first at the squirrel, then at Titley. From his features, which bore an expression of superlative coolness, the angry look again rested upon the squirrel. For a few seconds Tom Bolton thus continued his minute examination: at length he exclaimed, "May I be d—d! (God forgive me!) if there's a fool in this world to match you!"

"Duck him in a horse-pond," was an audible suggestion from his son.

"I wonder how his mamma came to trust him out alone," grinned a round, fat-faced yeoman, mounted upon a sorrel.

"Send for his nurse," said an enraged individual, sparing his own horse in the heat of his imagination, fancying that he was enjoying a few kicks at poor Titley.

"Lay on a poodle, and run him to a lady's lap," was another suggestion.

"With the utmost pleasure," replied Titley. "There's not a place in the wide world that I would sooner fly to. But, gentlemen—"

"No, no, no; we won't hear ye!" interrupted somebody, which, as a matter of course, occasioned the opposition cry of "Hear him! hear him!"

"No, no, no."

"Yes, yes, yes; hear him, hear him! Off, off—hear him!"

"No! order!"

The squire beckoned at last for silence. In a short time the shouts ceased, the uproarious peals of laughter were hushed, and, as the reporters say of "the house," order was restored.

"After two or three ineffectual efforts to speak, the squire said, 'Now, Titley, what have you to say?'"

Titley extracted from his pocket a white cambric handkerchief, and, after wiping his lips, thus commenced.

"Gentlemen, I candidly admit having caused much confusion, by mistaking that little animal perched up there for a fox—but—"

Another ebullition of laughter interrupted further progress for some minutes.

Titley's blunder was retrieved by Trimbush and his patron Tom Bolton, and reynard was finally run down in great style; a feat followed by a dinner at the squire's, and a happy social evening, though the adventures of Agnes and her brother Charles, which form the mystery of the drama, are here brought into play.

In preference, however, to such scenes as may be found in many common-place novels, we copy out the portrait of the curate of the parish, who did not persist in neglecting his bishop's standing order:

At least once a week to dine with the squire.

This curate is, we suspect, as rare in the Church as the squire is among the landed gentry.

"Checkmate," said the curate, rubbing his hands with pleasure, and moving a rook, which ended the game.

"Winged by the parson," replied the squire, pushing the chessboard from him. "A good struggle for it too."

"Pretty good this time," said the curate, who invariably wished the squire to believe that he could beat him easily. And, whenever the squire gained the victory, it was his constant assertion that "he could have won the game over and over again, but he wished to prolong it."

With high and low the curate was an object of unvarying admiration. The rich loved him for his unpretending, refined, and gentlemanly bearing; the poor blessed him for his kindness of heart and benevolent actions towards them. The flaxen-haired, ruddy-cheeked children ran to him, when they saw his tall thin figure approaching, and each was anxious to catch his approving eye, as the lock of hair was pulled upon the forehead, or the little curtsy bobbed to the ground. The old matron, who sat rocking in the sun, knitting her winter hose, would shield her bleared eyes with her thin, bony hand, and hobble upon her trembling limbs to welcome his coming, as "the good man" unlatched her garden gate. The sturdy peasant, returning from his work, raised his straw hat, and stopped his merry whistle, to pay respect to the minister as he passed. Wherever he went, a blessing echoed to his footsteps, and it was often asked, but never decided, which of the two was the greater favourite in the parish of Estead—the rich squire, who owned the greater portion of it, or the poor curate, who had but eighty pounds a-year.

"Ring the bell, Wilmott," said the squire; "we must see Peter about to-morrow's sport."

An old gray-headed servant answered the summons, and was told to send in the gamekeeper.

In a few minutes Peter Bumstead made his appearance. "Well, Peter," said the squire, "are all things prepared for our first crack at the pheasants to-morrow!"

Kate's music closes the evening, and all retire early to rest, that their nerves may be strung, by repose, for next day's sport.

Though the batue is, we presume, described in the most sportsman-like manner, we are content merely to report, that after a world of fun, from the roguish Jack Tiggles tormenting the phlegmatic Peter Bumstead, only forty-five brace of pheasants are bagged, with nine of hares, and seven couple of rabbits, which, in modern times, is a mere nothing.

Will Bolton's courtship next comes uppermost, and his father's intercession with the squire to have him and Fanny married at once, for the sake of morality. Squires seem to have singular ideas on the subject of matrimony, in relation to their huntsmen.

"I've always objected to my huntsman being married," said the squire. "Striver, I recollect, about five-and-twenty years ago, wanted to marry the dairymaid; but I told him if he did, he must leave my service."

William looked unhappy at this piece of intelligence, and his father appeared very uneasy in his chair.

"A wife cools a man's courage," continued the squire; "and a huntsman cannot have too much, so that it doesn't bear the shape of recklessness."

"Bless your soul, sir!" exclaimed Tom, with a knowing shake of the head; "a wife'll never take it out of him. With a mongrel-bred muff it might be otherwise. But, lor' bless us! my grandfather was first whip to the Duke of Beaufort's pack—my father was huntsman to the old squire for fifteen years, you know, sir. My mother was the only child to Tom Moody, the most celebrated whip as ever lived, not to say anything of myself being in your service, thank God, for five-an'-twenty years, whipper-in to as crack a set o' hounds as ever were unkenneled."

"You might have been huntsman, if you liked," said the squire.

"Through your goodness, sir, I might, long ago," rejoined Tom, touching his favourite gray lock upon his brow. "But I wished old Striver to keep his situation as long as he could. I didn't like to take his place when I was younger; and now my son Will fits it well, why, I never shall be anything else but the old whipper-in."

"Ay, and he's of more importance than the huntsman," said the squire.

"A true sportsman always says so, sir," added Tom; "but half the world don't think so—a parcel of know-nothings. However, referring to our start, you may depend, from such a breed as Will comes of, no wife on earth can spoil him. Striver was from a different nest; his father was a weaver, and his mother a straw-bonnet maker."

"Then you think William will ride up to the dogs as well married as single," said the squire.

"Certainly I do, sir," replied Tom. "From such a litter as he comes, nothing'll hurt him, not even old age. We all die green as cabbages," observed the old whipper-in, with a look of pride at the reminiscence of his ancestral dignity, and the hue of his family's complexion at their decease.

The squire enjoyed Tom's advocating his son's cause, and, after a little consideration, he said,—

"Well, I suppose I must give my consent; but remember, William, no flinching. My hounds have always been hunted properly since you took the place, and I will have them continued to be," said the squire, firmly.

"They shall, you may depend, sir," replied William, scarcely believing his senses. There was his father, arguing for his marriage, who had constantly been opposed to his having even a little conversation with a female.

"I return ye my and Fanny's thanks, sir, and you, father, for your kindness," said William; "and I'll endeavour to do my duty, so as to please both."

"He's a good boy, sir," observed Tom; "and marrying'll keep him quiet," added he, with a wink at his master.

"Give me your hand, William," said the squire. "There," shaking the hand of his servant warmly; "conduct yourself well to your wife, ride up to the dogs as usual, let all things be with you as they have been, in praiseworthy order, and you'll never hear a complaint from me."

"And if we've no more promiscuous courtin'—no more winking, billing, and cooing," said Tom, "you'll not have a complaint from me. Promiscuous courtin' is immoral," added Tom, oracularly; and the phrase afterwards became a county proverb.

A merry and jovial wedding is that of the young huntsman and Fanny, the pretty lady's maid of Kate Scourfield, as we shall afterwards see. But first we have a grand stag-hunt, which the ladies attend; and this minute and capital portrait of Striver the trapper, and his dog Button, which we prefer to the hunt, and recommend to the attention of artists.

A short-cropped, bob-tailed, wiry-terrier, sat upon his haunches, within a few feet of his master, watching with great interest his every movement. When his owner looked at the marks in the mud, the terrier put his head knowingly on one side, and also examined the seals stamped by the ball-footed otter. If the trapper moved a foot in advance, he too did the same; if one was retraced, he also retreated. Whatever movement his master made, the dog replied by a corresponding movement.

"A pretty cribber of trout, ain't he, Button!" said Striver to his dog.

Button rose from his squatting posture, doubtlessly from gratification at the compliment of being addressed in such good English, and replied, by wagging the short remains of his tail; which reply, being interpreted, signified that the otter was a pretty cribber of trout. A hearty, concluding shake implied the emphasis.

Taking all the abandoned parts of the fish he could find with him, Striver walked leisurely away. The terrier ran close to his heels in a short trot, and both took a direct road, from the bank of the river towards the Hall, which was just visible in the perspective. But, before the trapper and his companion had proceeded many yards, a large, round, silver watch was extracted from a fob of the size of a coachman's pocket, and the course of time gleaned from its white-faced dial.

"It's twenty minutes to five, Button," said Striver.

Button pricked his pointed ears, inclined his head sideways, and looked as if he questioned the accuracy of the report. "No it ain't," continued his master, inspecting more closely the specimen of a primitive watchmaker's handicraft; "it's twenty minutes past five, Button. My eyes grows worse an' worse every day."

Button put his ears back and gave a slight whimper, probably meaning to say, "I know that as well as you."

"The squire's a flower that don't open afore six," added Striver; "so we'll finish the traps before we go up to the house."

Button acquiescingly wagged what was left of his tail, and followed his master, who turned in an opposite direction from the hall. Their way was on the verge of the river towards a dark wood, looming through the gray mist in the distance. A long row of willows grew upon the bank, and drooped their branches gracefully into the babbling stream. Patches of green sedges reared themselves from the clear water, and waved their flags as it gurgled past. Here and there, a splash and a few floating bubbles showed the "whereabout" of one of the finny tribe.

Striver, as he walked slowly along, leaning upon his "spud," peered occasionally into the river to look for a fish. At last he saw a large pike just beneath the surface. The despoiler was motionless, as if taking a nap after his depredations of the night.

"Ah!" exclaimed the trapper; "we'll set a night line for you, my fine fellow—won't we, Button?"

But Button did not attend to the proposal; a very rare exception to his established rule. All his senses were occupied at the moment with the appearance of a water-rat gliding among some rushes.

Here occurs a long and animated fight with the water-rat.

"You're a wonder, Button," said Striver, stroking his dog's neck. "If there was a house of parliament where members was dogs, you'd be the speaker, in my opinion," continued he, giving him at the same time an encouraging smack on the head, which prostrated Button on the sod. Button knew what this meant, and rose from the ground prouder than ever, elevating his want of tail to the highest possible degree, and tracking his master's footsteps with an air of more conceit than a newly fledged exquisite displays in his first lounge up Regent Street, or a young equestrian, when first he displays his horsemanship in the presence of his lady-love.

If this eulogium was passed when only the rat was killed, what shall be said of Button's combat with a badger? It is absolutely Homeric. Button, though, at the close of the mortal combat, the victor, is terribly mangled.

"You'll limp for life," said the trapper; "and may I be flayed alive if I wouldn't prefer being lame than seeing you so!"

Button, notwithstanding his pain, wagged his tail at this expressed affection from his master.

"Lie there till I take up the sacks," said Striver, pulling off his coat and spreading it on the ground as a bed for Button. "We must get home as soon as we can, to dress your wounds, poor fellow."

The sacks were soon taken from the earths, and the body of the badger placed in one of them. Throwing it over one shoulder, Striver lifted Button under his arm, and took his way homewards.

"You must have a dip in the river, Button, although it is cold," said the trapper, as Button's blood trickled down his fingers. "There's nothing like a running stream for a flesh wound." Proceeding towards the bank of the river, which was not far off, Striver continued to caress and talk to his dog.

"I'll have a new cap made of this warmint's skin," said he, "and when I hear 'em talk of dogs' pluck, Button, I'll show it to them, and relate the fight you had to-night, my boy. You were a wonder from your infancy. I recollect you bit a kitten's tail off before you were two month's old; and when the old woman that owned her threw you into a pond for doing it, you scrambled out again, and yapped at her afterwards. I said then you'd be a wonder, and so you are."

Coming to the stream, Striver picked out a convenient spot, and laved the body and limbs of his favourite. In the moonlit water Button was placed with as much gentleness as if he had been a tender child. His sores were cleaned, and from his sleek skin all stains of gore removed. With a fevered tongue he lapped the clear water, and soon became much refreshed. After wiping him with his handkerchief, Striver wrapped his coat about Button to shield him from the cold, and continued his road towards home.

The huntsman's wedding was to be celebrated on Christmas day. The squire had built him a commodious and pretty cottage, and furnished it with everything useful and convenient, which he presented to Fanny. The young ladies supplied the bride's wardrobe, and Mr. Wilmott and Titley loaded the bridegroom with handsome presents.

"Gentlemen, you are too kind to us," stammered William.

Mr. Bolton drew his fingers across his eyes pathetically, and then extracted that which had once been a black morocco pocket-wallet, of capacious size, from his coat-pocket. Years of constant friction had worn away its external beauties, but had materially added to its internal charms. A thick roll of notes was pulled from its secret depths, and, with a generous glow of pride sparkling in his eyes, Mr. Bolton handed the money to Fanny, saying, his old woman was banker, and, from the way she managed the exchequer, he thought women were the best fund-holders.

"There's two hundred and fifty pounds, as Will's fortune," said he, "which is sufficient for a pretty start; and, when I am run to earth, there will be twice as much more."

Fanny found herself seized hold of immediately after this address, and her face tingled for some minutes from sundry rough and very ardent kisses.

"That's over," said the squire. "Now for some mulled wine, to drink a merry Christmas, and then to bed, for to-morrow we must be fresh and gay as larks."

"Stop one moment," said the clergyman; "I've not added my mite."

Two volumes neatly bound, were taken in the curate's thin, white fingers, and, as he gave one to each, a breathless silence ensued. His lips moved, but no sound escaped them. Short was the blessing; but, if ever a whispered prayer was wafted to Heaven, that one was heard there.

This Christmas eve is all very pretty; and so is the wedding day—

A thin crust of snow covered the ground, just permitting the points of the grass to peep above its surface, as the old whipper-in strode from his cottage door towards the Hall. A keen wind nipped his nose, and benumbed his fingers, each step crisping under his tread, as he bustled along. Scarcely a cloud was visible, but the rays of the sun were pale, and gave little warmth to the bleached earth. Myriads of sparkling gems danced and flashed in the light. Flocks of chilled birds covered the thorns, and pecked the red berries for want of more dainty fare. The robin perched himself upon the leafless bough, and whistled his winter song. It was Christmas morning—a bright, cold, bracing day.

"Ah!" exclaimed Mr. Bolton, "here's a day for Will's throw off. All things in season's my motto. Hot weather for hay-making; southerly winds and cloudy skies for fox-hunting; snow and frost for matrimony. Hot days don't suit the con-nubial start. They put the parties out of condition."

The church clock had just struck ten, when the bells rung a joyous peal. Far away in the clear, frosty air the sounds were borne. Through wood and vale, far and wide, the merry din announced the huntsman's wedding.

Along the path, leading from the church to the Hall, returned the bridal party. William and his bride walked in advance, followed by Kate and Agnes, who, by their own desire, acted as bridesmaids. The squire and Mr. Bolton succeeded them. The curate, Wilmott, and Titley, followed. Then came thirty of the squire's friends, who regularly joined the hounds, all dressed in scarlet, and equipped for the chase. The rear was brought up by Peter Bumstead, Jack Tiggie, and the rest of the domestics.

"Now then," said the squire, entering the servants' hall, "let us have the bowl."

In a few minutes a large, old-fashioned china bowl was brought in by the butler. To the brim it was filled with spiced wine, which sent a fragrant steam to the ceiling. Roasted apples hissed and floated in the capacious vessel, and a large ladle was buried within an inch of the fawn-foot handle in its contents.

"Glasses all round," ordered the squire. "Now fill away," continued he, setting the example.

In a short period all were charged.

"Here's health, long life, and happiness to William Bolton and his pretty wife," said the squire, in a loud voice, and emptying his goblet.

The toast met with an enthusiastic reception. Each seemed desirous to evince the sincerity of his feelings, as the glass to friendship was raised and quaffed. Rough but honest grasps were exchanged; hearts beat quick and light; and not one in that merry company felt a throb of envy, jealousy, or malice.

A few hours passed gaily enough, when the dinner-bell boomed forth the welcome tidings of the prepared meal. At the head of one of three long tables, groaning under the weight of its substantial dishes, sat the squire. On each side of him were the ladies; Wilmott was at the bottom, with the curate and his friend Titley flanking him right and left. William sat at the head of another board, having his wife on one side of him, and his father on the other. At the remaining table were Peter, with his evil genius, Jack Tiggle, close to his side, and old Striver acting as vice-president. The gentlemen of the hunt, with the Scourfield tenantry, were seated at the squire's table. The domestics and William's invited guests placed themselves as it suited their inclinations at the others.

After a brief but suitable blessing from the curate, off flew the bright covers, and for a few moments the fragrant steam enveloped the company, as if a thick fog had suddenly forced itself through the chinks of the floor. Then such a clatter of knives, forks, and plates rung through the hall! Barons of beef dwindled from their huge dimensions, like snow in the bright sunshine; plump capons became mere shadows of their former greatness; and at length the disappearance of haunches of fat venison, pheasants, hares, turkeys, with some large solid plum-puddings, announced the conclusion of the feast.

The choicest wine from the vast cellars was brought in by the gouty butler. Magnums of rosy port, faded from its pristine colour by time, and round which the spider had twined his clinging web in days long past, were dug from their sawdust grave. Madeira, bright as keen wit, gurgled from the disgorging bottle, and bowls of odoriferous punch stood creaming at convenient distances.

After the squire had pledged the whole of the company, and many a loyal and patriotic toast had been given, "Clear away for the dance," said he; "heap more logs on the fire, and tune up your fiddle, Striver."

In a few moments chairs and tables were stowed away, and Striver, mounted on one of them in a corner of the room, commenced scraping a merry tune. On each side ranged the company, and, with the light step of boyhood, the squire led off the country dance with the bride. Down the middle and up again, they tripped to the inspiring strain from Striver's bow.

To Mr. Bolton's indescribable surprise and gratification, Kate challenged him to dance with her. Tom's eyes glistened as his graceful young mistress gave him her hand to join in the "fantastic dance."

"Spring and winter," growled Peter, as a slight pang of envy shot through his breast.

The observation was not lost upon Mr. Bolton, who, with a look of mingled indignation and pride, gave a hazardous flourish to lead off his fair partner with, and to prove the springy capacity of his heels.

"Capital, capital!" hallooed the squire, delighted to see Tom's successful attempt "to poise in air, and measure to the sound."

Dance after dance, and reel after reel, succeeded each other, till at length fatigue began to display itself, not only in the wearied votaries of Terpsichore, but also in old Striver's digits.

"Keep it up," cried Tom. "For'ard, for'ard: we're not run into yet."

And his white top-boots skipped up and down with the speed of a much younger man, as he set in a quick reel to Fanny.

"But I," said Striver, dropping his fiddle, "am trapped with the fore pads."

"Then we're checked," replied Tom, coming to a stand.

"Check-mated," added the curate, dwelling upon his favourite game.

As the night waned, the great folks withdrew; and merry tales were told, and jolly songs were sung; and Peter Bumstead, in prime condition, was helped carefully to bed by his ordinary tormentor, Jack Tiggle.

Partridge shooting, coursing, angling, love-making, cross-purposes, the squire's visit to London, and mysteries growing more mysterious, we pass by, to reach Peter Bumstead's characteristic courtship of Widow Tiggle, who did up his Sunday and gala-day shirts, and was the mother of the hopeful Jack.

The two chimney-corners of Mrs. Tiggle's apartment, which served for "a kitchen, a parlour, and all," were occupied respectively by her hopeful son Jack, and his friend Peter Bumstead, the surly. The former was engaged in twisting some waxed thread about the bleached bone of a chicken, yclept the "merry thought" to construct, for his own special amusement and edification, an instrument known as a "skip jack." The latter sat with his hands crossed upon his knees, and looked vacantly upon the industrious fingers of his companion. A thoughtful cloud hung loweringly upon the gamekeeper's brow, and a continued restless movement of his hobnailed boots upon the snow-white hearth showed that Peter's feelings were not of the tranquil order. Now and then he cast an oblique glance at Mrs. Tiggle, who, with extraordinary care, was crimping the bosom-ruffle of his favourite shirt. The good dame's red, round, healthy face glowed with unusual radiancy. Upon her lips a smile of triumph played, and, as she knew that Peter's impassioned gaze was bent upon her, a gentle sigh heaved from her capacious but tender bosom, and Mrs. Tiggle softly murmured that "she felt she didn't know how."

"I can't stand it no longer," ejaculated Peter, suddenly rising from his chair, and assuming an attitude worthy of Demosthenes himself, "I can't stand it no longer," he repeated, "or I shall bust."

"What!" exclaimed Jack.

"Bust," replied Peter, firmly, bringing his heavy fist with a crash upon the trembling table.

"Mr. Bumstead," said Mrs. Tiggle, in a faint voice, "you put me all in a twitter."

"And me in a devil of a shake," added Jack, afraid he was about receiving payment for an old score; "pray, what have I done now?" inquired he.

"Nothing, my dear John," replied Peter, in such an affectionate tone that it even startled himself.

"Nothing, my dear John," repeated Jack, with his mouth wide open, and his eyes stretched to the utmost limit of their capacities. He had never before been so addressed by Mr. Bumstead; and the change alarmed him.

"No," continued Peter, "and, if you had, I wouldn't lick ye now: not for your mother's sake."

Jack was confounded. He looked at Mr. Bumstead for an explanation of this sudden change which had come over the spirit of his actions, and a slight conception bubbled in Jack's cerebrum that the gamekeeper's brain was not entirely free from the thick fumes of strong ale.

Mrs. Tiggle folded the finished shirt, and sighed again.

"Ah!" responded Peter. He tried to imitate the sound; but the attempt was more like the grunt of a discontented pig, than the echo from a lone-worn heart.

A pause ensued. Jack still continued to wonder, and was about interrogating for the cause of all these startling effects, when, after some unsuccessful attempts, Peter's courage became screwed to the speaking point.

"How would you relish a father, my dear John?" inquired he, taking the labour-hardened hands of Mrs. Tiggle between his own, and blushing the colour of a scraped mangel-wurzel root.

"I don't want no fathers," replied Jack, gloomily, a sudden light breaking through the misty mystery. "I've had one, haven't I! No one wants two on 'em, I suppose," continued he.

"The nestling hand of a parent," said Peter, "is —"

"Anything but a light un," interrupted Jack, tapping his shoulders significantly.

"But I wasn't a parent on them occasions," argued Peter.

"That's a fact," observed Jack.

"Nor you a son," said Mr. Bumstead.

"Very true," added Jack, "particularly when I soused you at the other hunt."

"Ah, you playful rogue!" replied Peter, lifting his foot, and inflicting the slightest possible kick upon Master Tiggie's extreme rear.

"Well, mother," observed Jack, "what do you say to giving me another father!"

"Say!" exclaimed Peter, placing one arm round the portly waist of the widow, and folding the other to his bosom. "Would she break her Bumstead's heart! would she skin his tender soul, and tree it like a trapped tom-cat!—would she collar a doe hare in April, and strangle her like a blind mongrel pup!—would she gaff a spawning salmon!—would she foot a pheasant's nest!—would she —"

"No, no, no!" interrupted Mrs. Tiggie, bathed in melting tears, and hiding her moistened cheeks in her Bumstead's waistcoat.

"I knew it, my cooing wood-dove," rejoined the victorious Peter, snatching a kiss from the willing Mrs. Tiggie's lips. "Cruelty, thy name ain't woman," poetically remarked the excited Bumstead, concluding the chaste salute.

"So I am to have another dad, am I?" said Jack. "It's a wise child, I've heard, as knows his own father," continued he; "but, when a chap has a couple on 'em to pick from, that doubles the odds."

"Shake hands with your parent that is to be," said Mr. Bumstead in an uncertain voice. Something appeared to have risen suddenly in his throat; he was becoming visibly affected with the solemnity of the occasion.

"Honour him," observed Mrs. Tiggie, with an admonitory shake of her head, and pointed finger, "that your days may be long in the land —"

"My governor ploughed, and mother gleaned in," said Jack, cutting short his esteemed parent's lecture. "So, tip us your fin, dad the second."

A gentle tap at the door here attracted their attention.

"Come in," said Mrs. Tiggie; when the door swung open upon its creaking hinges, and exhibited the figure of Mr. Bolton upon the threshold.

"Good evening, sir," was Mrs. Tiggie's respectful salutation, as she bobbed a curtsy, and stood with ready hand to usher her guest into the room.

"The same to you, marm," replied Tom, touching his hat, and striding into the apartment.

Jack rose from his chair, and, shaking a stuffed cushion to make a soft seat, invited the old whipper-in to occupy it.

"He'll make a good un yet," said Tom, giving Jack a pull of the ear; "when his knowing days are over."

"How do you find yourself this evening?" inquired Peter.

"Getting more coltish every hour, I believe," replied Tom. "Nothing but weddings now-a-days, eh, Mrs. Tiggie? Ah! you needn't put your head in that flour poke—I know all about it."

"It's settled," audibly whispered Peter.

"Settled!—of course it's settled!" rejoined Mr. Bolton. "I am settled—everything is settled. I shall dance on my head when all these events come off. I feel that Time's hour glass is turned; the old codger is running the sand through once more for me. I'm no longer the old whipper-in, but young Tom Bolton, a harum-scarum, random, helter-skelter, tearaway, flyaway, dashing, splashing, rascal. That's what I am," concluded he; but when he would have done so, had not his wind been expended, it is difficult to say.

"Now, Mrs. T." resumed Tom, "when are you to be christened Mrs. B., eh?"

"Lor, sir," replied Mrs. Tiggie, "how abasquated you make a body feel, to be sure!"

"Absquat—what!" said Mr. Bolton; "isn't it natural for a body to feel a sort of a queer all-overishness on the eve of a wedding, I should like to know!"

"In course it is," replied Peter; "in course it is, Mr. Bolton. I feel a wonderful rum sort of a titillation in all my sinies."

"Sinews, Peter, sinews," observed Mr. Bolton with a patronizing air.

"I meant sinews," rejoined Peter, humbly; "we were just coming to the day, sir, when you knocked," continued he.

"Then it isn't fixed," said Mr. Bolton.

"No, sir," replied Mrs. Tiggie, "I can't say the precise day to-night."

"Then I'll do it for you," said Tom. "This day month's the ticket. It's the last day of the season," continued he, with an elongated visage. "The very last run before summer has darkened the sprouting corn. Oh, dear me!" sighed the old whipper-in, "it's like going to a funeral. One's spirits can't rise on a blank day, and what day so blank as the last day o' the season!—Not one in the almanack."

"But I shouldn't like you to be out of condition on this occasion, sir," said Peter.

"The greater the drain, the more necessary the supply," rejoined Tom; "if a man is down upon his hocks, he requires more stimulants, than if he was going it cheerily on his daisy-trimmers."

"Well!" observed Mrs. Tiggie, spreading a coarse, but ivory-complexioned cloth upon the table; "I won't be a stumbling-block to the arrangement; so let it be this day month."

"Bravely said," added Tom, and rising from his recumbent attitude in the easy chair's embrace, he pulled from his pocket a large square silk handkerchief, and, after wiping his lips with scrupulous care, with a very grave and matter-of-course expression of countenance, he seized Mrs. Tiggie in his arms, and imprinted a loud kiss upon her fat and rosy cheek.

"That's a sauce mother's palate hasn't been tickled with a long time," said Jack.

"The greater relish, then," replied Tom, screwing up his lips, as if they had enjoyed a luxury.

A dark thunderish appearance hovered about Mr. Bumstead's features when the old whipper-in's lips smacked together. An unusual phosphoric light flashed in his eyes, and he looked as if enduring the animal-magnetic influence of the green-eyed monster. This effect was not lost upon Mr. Bolton, who, with a broad, honest laugh, said—

"None o' your bristles, Peter. These feathers," pushing his fingers through his few gray hairs, "are too thin and seared for that. A toothless hound doesn't travel far for a —"

"Lady," interrupted Peter, anticipating with fear the sequel of Mr. Bolton's simile.

Tom smiled at the gamekeeper's suddenly acquired refinement.

"You're right," rejoined he; but still he'll bend his shanks to one o' the pack, or he's not thoroughbred."

During this discussion, Mrs. Tiggie and Jack busied themselves in preparing the refreshments. A boiled fowl was almost done to a hiss in the saucepan; sliced potatoes crackled and snapped in a frying-pan; some rashers of bacon steamed fragrantly between two plates; a tin pan of roasted cheese sent forth its strong fumes reeking to the ceiling, and with some fancifully moulded fresh butter, Mrs. Tiggie's culinary display gave promise of no ordinary share of creature-comforts for Peter's future life.

Jack vanished for a few minutes, bearing in his hand a large empty brown jug; and, upon again making his appearance, it was frothed to the brim with foaming ale. Then his mother dived into a deep cupboard, and from this secret depository produced a black bottle, containing a liquid not publicly swallowed by teetotallers, but administered medicinally in private.

A look of pride illumined the features of Mr. Bumstead as he gazed on the preliminaries; nor was this look less intense from the spur of a sharp appetite.

If our readers cannot relish this scene, then much of the very marrow of the Old English Gentleman is lost to them; and they will not thank us to finish it, though we rather imagine ourselves entitled to their warmest gratitude—

The old Dutch clock, which had tick-tocked for thirty years 'neath Mrs. Tiggles's hospitable roof, struck the tenth hour before the remnants of the supper were abandoned.

"There's a favour I would ask," said Peter, throwing down his knife and fork, his appetite being more than satiated. "I'm wonderful bashful, and always was. If, Mr. Bolton, you'd just mention our case to the squire, instead of me, it would be a mortal respite, I can tell ye."

"I'll do it," replied Tom, burying his nose in the froth of a quart of ale.

"And I, sir," said Jack, "have a —" but here he paused.

"Take a pull at the pot, and at him again," suggested the old whipper-in, offering Jack the foaming beer. "Let your note be full and deep on a right scent. Never hunt back, but hark for'ard, remember."

"I was going to say," recommenced Jack, "if you would get the squire to let me be under you, sir, and learn to become a whipper-in, I'd worship you, Mr. Bolton, boots and all."

Jack's sincerity was portrayed in his undisguised enthusiasm. Every nerve seemed to thrill with interest, as he expressed his desire.

"An ounce of blood's worth a pound of bone," said Tom, giving Jack a thump of encouragement between his shoulders. "There's breedin' here. None o' your puddle wish-wash runs in these veins, but clear, out-and-out, genuine English blood. I always thought so, Mrs. Tiggles."

The mother looked with pride upon the object of Mr. Bolton's praise, and Jack blushed for the first time in his life.

"Give me your hand, my boy," continued Tom. "There, from this hour, you're second whip to the Scour-field hunt. Ride straight to hounds, be respectful to the field, keep a muzzel on your tongue; but when ye halloo, let it be music that'll charm the angels. None o' your thin, penny-trumpet squeaks for me. Let your heart be in your voice, like a true sportsman's, full of ardour, strength, and manhood. Striver's cheer was always like a frog-eating Frenchman's. Listen to my son Will's—there's a peal. A Bolton was always celebrated for his cheer," remarked the old whipper-in, with a sparkle of pride flitting in his eyes.

"I'll do nothing but what you tell me, sir," replied the excited Jack, with shadows of scarlet coats, black caps, and leather breeches, dancing in his heated imagination.

We must follow out Jack's promotion. Next morning, while the squire was conversing merrily from his chamber-window with the young ladies, who were rallying him on the old fashion of his night-cap, he exclaims—

"Nonsense, ye chatters; it keeps my head warm, and that's enough for me. But, bless my soul! what's this?"

The squire's expression of astonishment was caused by the appearance of Jack Tiggles, mounted on one of his old favourite horses, coming at a foot-pace down the park, with Mr. Bolton walking by his side. Jack was dressed in a neat, scarlet coat, black velvet cap, buckskin-breeches and top-boots. A white cravat was tied very neatly round his neck. Tom was the artiste, and altogether Jack looked the very essence of a whipper-in.

With majestic stateliness they arrived opposite the squire, who cried out—

"Why, Tom! what's this about, eh?"

"I'm giving him a lesson, sir," replied Mr. Bolton; "and, next to Will, he's the likeliest pupil I've ever seen."

"You'll spoil him if you talk in that way," said Wil-mott.

"Will I?" responded Tom, significantly, and cracking the thong of his heavy whip. "Sugar and flax is the stuff for the young uns. Spoil him, indeed!" and again the lash snapped in the air.

"Can he halloo?" inquired the squire.

"He could, sir," replied Mr. Bolton; "but I think it's all out of him now; isn't it, Jack?"

"Yes, sir, I'm hoarser than an old rook," said Jack, in a deep, cracked voice.

"He's been at it for an hour," observed the old whipper-in; "and his lungs must be tough leather to stand that as well as they have!"

"Is he to go with us to-day?" asked the squire.

"No, sir," replied the old whipper-in. "Next Friday is the time fixed. And, please God, he'll not look a tailor among us."

"As you please, Tom, as you please," said the squire.

"And so you intend he should take your place, I suppose," said Agnes, quizzing the old whipper-in.

"Not while I live, miss," replied Tom, shaking his head—"not while I live. But he shall be ready for the empty saddle when I'm earthed."

"Don't talk in that fashion," said the squire. "When you're run down, I shall want breath too, I know."

That time was more nearly at hand than could have been anticipated; but before it arrived, the old whipper-in joyously celebrated the birth-night of his son. It is introduced by a well-written passage of pathetic moralising on the brevity of life—

It was on a rough, boisterous night, the fourteenth of March, that William's cottage contained more inmates than were ever before assembled within its walls at any one time. At a round-table sat Mr. Bolton, playing "all fours" with Mrs. Tiggles, while the attentive Peter watched her cards and scored the board. Most of the domestics from the Hall, with William and Fanny, were arranging themselves for a country dance; while the village fiddler, mounted on an empty flour-tub in a corner of the room, was tuning, "Singing Sukey." Striver was placed in the easy chair close to the fire, with the maimed Button couched upon his knees. At a side-table, Jack was fully occupied in carving slices from a large ham. Whether his knife slipped occasionally, cannot be ascertained with any degree of precision; but certain it is, that now and then a tit-bit of lean, of convenient proportions, fell upon the dish, and was no sooner there than it was conveyed to Jack's epicurean palate. Gouty Bob, the butler, was mixing some potent beverage in a wide and deep china bowl. From time to time he sipped a spoonful of the fragrant drink, and, after adding a lump or two of sugar, then, giving another gentle squeeze of the lemon, and popping in a shaving more of lime, he smacked his lips, and patted those regions surgically described as abdominal.

"It'll do, Jack," said Bob.

"I don't believe it," responded Jack.

Now, if some extraordinary convulsion of nature had suddenly lifted the roof from Bob's head, and exposed the blinking, twinkling stars, in place of the whitewashed ceiling, Bob could not have evinced greater astonishment. To doubt the quality of his palate—it was sacrilege; to question his opinion of punch—it was felony.

It was some time before the butler could resolve on what steps to take for revenging this foul affront. If the punch-bowl had been deep enough, there can be little doubt Jack would have been drowned in good liquor, as a certain royal personage was treated in the "good old days," when men wore swords as wasps do stings. But, as this was not the case, Bob determined upon a more pleasant mode of vindicating his honour. Filling a round fat-looking glass with the abused composition, he offered it to Jack, saying,

"Drink that. Let it rest in your throat as if it was a mile long, and then confess yourself an unbelieving, miserable specimen of a know-nothing."

Jack obeyed the instructions faithfully. When he had done so, with a very equivocal expression of modesty, he eyed the butler shrewdly, and said, "Mr. Bob, I am."

Bob was satisfied.

The fiddler flourished his bow; all were ready, and off they went, to as merry a tune as ever was scraped from catgut.

"Trip it lightly," said Tom; "we'll join ye presently. High, low, Jack, and the game, ma'am," continued he, pegging the score.

On the white-sanded floor the party shuffled, whirled, and skipt, with light heels and lighter hearts. A new spring was given to the dance, when the old whipper-in joined it. He twisted his heavy partner here and there; between the filed line he galloped her up and down, until the rubicund countenance of Mrs. Tiggie became of the melting order.

"You're out of wind, ma'am," said Mr. Bolton, considerably. "And, if truth must be told, I'm panting a little."

"You'd better sit, my dear Mrs. T.," whispered Peter, "or I fear you'll become too moist."

"Thank's, Mr. Bumstead, I will," replied Mrs. Tiggie, with her most winning look at the ensnared gamekeeper.

"Don't, pray don't," said Peter, beseechingly, "or them looks 'll singe me into ashes."

Mrs. Tiggie smiled at the compliment, and swallowed a large glass of punch which Peter handed to her.

The inspiring strains from the fiddle ceased, while all partook of Bob's matchless mixture. From Mr. Bolton to the fiddler, who were the highest and the most humble there, in the butler's opinion, he regarded each as the glass was taken from his lips. When Tom refilled his goblet immediately after emptying it, and gave his customary demonstrative smack of satisfaction, Bob rubbed his knees, and chuckled with delight.

"It's as rich as oil, Mr. Bolton, isn't it?" said Bob. "It hangs about a man's mouth like honey in a comb. A man couldn't die with that in his mouth," continued the enthusiastic butler. "It would keep his body and soul together even against his will."

"Hush, Bob, hush," replied the old whipper-in, reprovingly; "we mustn't discuss religious subjects here."

Half an hour had just elapsed, and most appeared to have recovered from their exertions, when William desired the fiddler to stick some fresh rosin on his bow, and strike music from the tightened string.

"Come, Striver," said the young huntsman, "give over nursing Button, and join us in a fling."

"No, William, no," replied the trapper; "my dancing days are over."

"You won't refuse me as a partner," said Fanny, who wore as pretty little caps, now she was a wife, as previous to her marriage—a rule not invariably adopted by ladies in the holy state of matrimony.

"A corpse would do his best, ma'am, if axed by you," replied Striver, displacing Button from his knees, and joining Mrs. Bolton in the dance.

"There's a merry set," said Tom to Peter, as he watched the dance, seated in a snug place quite out of the way, with some very substantial and excellent viands placed on a table before them.

"It does one's heart good to see 'em," replied the gamekeeper, carving a large slice from a thick round of beef. "I could look at 'em for ever."

It is questionable to which Peter alluded, the refreshments or the dancers; but, as he gazed only upon the beef when he delivered the observation, the former appeared to be the engrossing subject to which he referred.

The night was far advanced before the dance was deserted. Between the gusts of the boisterous wind which howled outside, a few strokes from the hall-clock were heard, when William said—

"We are creeping into the early hours, my friends; let us try the contents of my wife's larder by way of a wind-up."

Again the ready Bob was desired to fill the punch-bowl. Crowding round the table, the guests partook of the good cheer provided. Mr. Bolton hob-an'-nobbed with everybody; he kissed his daughter-in-law, and threatened Mrs. Tiggie with a similar infliction, which caused a convulsive twitching in Peter's features.

"Do you feel stiff in the joints, Striver?" inquired Mr. Bolton.

"No, sir," replied the trapper; "but as limin as a fitchew."

"Well said," rejoined Tom. "Fill a bumper; you're as blithe as a cock-lark. I mean, too, that bumpers should be filled all round," added he.

The glasses were filled to the brim as directed, and, as the old whipper-in rose, voices were silenced, and all noise ceased.

"My friends," commenced Tom, "this is my son Will's birthnight, and I think you'll agree with me, few nights of our lives have been spent more agreeably. Just about this time," said Mr. Bolton, pulling from his fob a thick silver watch, and gazing with a smile upon its dial, "seven-an'-twenty years ago Will was hatched. When I was told that I was a father, a warm spark seemed to glow internally, never felt by me before, and from that moment it has never been extinguished. It may have been the glow-worm spark of pride; and if it was, my friends, the cause was sufficient for the effect, for, of all the plump fat babies I ever heard of, Will beat 'em all to shavings."

Loud applause and laughter interrupted Mr. Bolton's progress.

"Silence! silence!" hallooed Tom, good-humouredly waving his hand.

"Silence!" roared Jack, seconding Mr. Bolton's request.

"He was, indeed," continued the old whipper-in. "I looked at his legs first, when he was presented to me wrapped up in one of the late Mrs. Bolton's flannel petticoats, and saw at once Nature had blessed him with well-shaped shins for embracing a horse's ribs. 'He's born to ride well,' said I to Striver there, who was present at the time; and my words were proved true before I expected. He wasn't four year old when the squire saw the young care-nought climb upon the back of a yearling, and ride him about the park like the wind, until the colt dropped from exhaustion. As in duty bound, I scolded Will for doing it; but may I be whipped if I didn't feel prouder of him for this act than many a better one since! Like all young fellows of his kindry—and I don't disguise it from his wife—he was a little too fond of courting the lasses; but it was his only fault that I could discover. And, although I'm his father, I say, without fear of contradiction, a better son, taking him all in all, a parent was never blest with. To have allowed somebody else to propose the toast I'm about to give ye, might, perhaps, have been more in accordance with stiffnecked rules. But, as we are not governed by any such vapourish humbug, I beg to propose the long life, health, happiness, and prosperity of my son Will, the squire's huntsman. May he have many returns of this night!"

Too soon came the last and fatal day of the season. The squire's hunting attendants, hiped and quadruped, took the field in all their splendour. Every man and hound was great, but Tom Bolton was glorious—

Tom's favourite hound, Trimbush, stood, as usual, apart from his fellows, and, pressing his head close to Mr. Bolton's top-boots, uttered some threatening growls at a third person in the court. This was Jack Tiggie, equipped from head to foot for the chase, and entering, for the first time in his life, upon the responsible duties of whipper-in. Attentively he watched the huntsman's proceedings, and kept a willing ear for any order from him.

"Trimbrush, Trimbrush," said Mr. Bolton, reprovingly, "you must be friends with Jack. Never be rusty with those in authority," continued the old whipper-in, stroking the hound's proudly bent neck.

"He doesn't relish Jack's fresh bit o' pink," said William.

"No," responded Mr. Bolton: "he's aware that something's going on more than common."

"Open that door, Jack," said William.

In an instant the command was obeyed, the selected hounds were permitted to leave the kennel, and, heading the well-trained pack, William proceeded with them towards the Hall, closely followed by Tom and Jack, the latter mounted on a fiery chestnut, which he managed with much skill and courage.

"Handle him gently," said Mr. Bolton; "he'll soften down in a minute or two."

In their way they had to pass Mrs. Tiggie's cottage.

Long previous to being in view, the proud Mrs. Tiggie stood on the threshold, shading her face from the dazzling sunshine, and straining her eyes to catch sight of their coming. Peter Bumstead occupied a close station by her side, and held in his expansive hand a flagon of ale.

"I don't see 'em," said Mrs. Tiggie; "they're a plaguy long time."

"Calm ye'r agitation, my dear Mrs. T—," said the gamekeeper; "they'll be here by-an'-by."

A few rustics, in long smock-frocks, stood lolling against the palings of Mrs. Tiggie's garden, and some round-faced village children were sitting on the bank opposite, speaking in whispers about "young Mr. Tiggie," as they now termed him.

"Here they be," said a fat, chubby boy, turning a summerset in the road, and skipping about with the delight of an escaped kid.

Mrs. Tiggie's heart gave an extra jump at this piece of intelligence, and sent the blood scarlet to her forehead.

The hounds came trotting in a group gaily down the lane, with their long waving tails plumed over their backs. Although the leader in the run, Trimbrush was always the last hound to the meet. He travelled by the side of Mr. Bolton's horse, and acted the privileged favourite to the letter.

"Good morning," said William, checking his horse.

"Good morning, sir," replied Mrs. Tiggie, but gazing only upon her son. If the Emperor of all the Russias had been present, he would have been disregarded by Mrs. Tiggie.

"He looks like business, ma'am, doesn't he?" inquired Mr. Bolton.

"Beautiful, beautiful!" exclaimed the gratified mother, clasping her hands; "he looks like a — a — a —"

"Heavenly cherub in top-boots," said Peter, helping his charmer out, and offering the filled flagon to Mr. Bolton.

"Here's your health, ma'am," said Tom; and all your good healths, especially yours, Jack. May you do credit to yourself and to me to-day!"

Mr. Bolton's nose was buried in the froth for a long time, and, when it emerged, a noise burst from his lips resembling that of a diver lifting his head above water, after three minutes' immersion. William, likewise, expressed his good wishes for Jack's well-doing, and took a draught of Mrs. Tiggie's very best genuine malt and hops.

Jack peeped at the bottom of the jug as it was handed to him by his intended father-in-law, and, saying "he thanked them all," quaffed the remainder of the ale. With the admiration of the spectators, and the exclamations of delight from Mrs. Tiggie, the hounds proceeded on their way to the meet.

The squire, Wilmott, and Titley were sitting in their saddles at the park gates, surrounded by a very large field of sportsmen, when the pack approached. The last day of the Scourfield hunt brought numbers from a great distance at the close of each season, and never were there more out than on this occasion.

"Here comes my second whip," said the squire, laughing.

"How remarkably well he looks!" added Titley.

"He cannot be under better hands," observed Wilmott; "old Tom will soon make him a crack sportsman."

Jack took off his cap as he rode through the congregated sportsmen, and not one there but admired the dashing exterior of the young novice.

"Careless, lass. War horse," said he, giving Careless a taste of his thong.

Mr. Bolton looked aside at the squire, and nodded his head slightly towards his pupil, as much as to say, "he's up to it, squire."

"Which do you draw first?" inquired Wilmott.

"The lawn cover, sir," replied William.

"A sure find," said the squire.

All moved in the direction of the wood, which was about half a mile distant.

"These thirty acres of furze will puzzle them, I think," said Wilmott.

"Not if we happen upon one of the right sort," replied the squire; "but, if he's a coward, and won't break, they will."

The huntsman dashed into the cover with the pack, and cheered them to the chase. Through the thick underwood they threaded their way, and all was silent, when a hound gave a loud cry.

"Hark to Prattler," hallooed William; but no other responded to the call.

"There's no certainty with Prattler," said the old whipper-in; "he's a quick hound; but no reliance can be placed upon him in cover."

Some time elapsed before any cheerful sound was heard again. At length Jack's youthful voice made many a heart beat quick. Musical and clear it peeled from the side of the cover where he was stationed, as he saw the fox cross a ride, making towards the opposite end from which the hounds were hunting.

"Hoik, halloo, hoik, halloo!" shouted the old whipper-in, working his head from one side to the other with pleasure at hearing his pupil's voice.

Away came the willing hounds to the summons. Trimbrush flew like a meteor to Tom's voice, and chimed out his deep-toned note as he picked up the scent of the skulking fox. In his rear followed his noisy companions, loading the air with their merry cries.

"Hold hard, Jack," said Mr. Bolton; "keep your eye for'ard to the left."

The old whipper-in had just given this injunction, when sly reynard leaped from the cover at the spot he had pointed out, and sped away at a rattling pace.

"Tally-ho, tally-ho, tally-ho!" sung Jack.

"I knew how it would be," observed Mr. Bolton, lifting his cap, and making the welkin ring with his view halloo.

William shot past with a bunch of tail hounds, and laying them on, in a moment all were together, and away they went at a pace to outstrip the wind.

"There's no waiting time to-day," said the squire, spurring his horse over a fallow.

"No, sir," replied Tom, with a smile; "but there's a good many here who'll wait before long."

Over a light grass country the hounds flew at a racing pace. The enclosures were large; but, when a leap was to be taken, it was "a yawner," as Mr. Bolton described it. Jack rode a little in advance of his mentor, and was second in the hunt to William.

"How well that boy rides!" said Titley.

"He does, indeed," replied Wilmott; "I saw him take a tremendous jump just now, like an experienced jockey."

"It's in him, sir," said Mr. Bolton, overhearing the observation; "he couldn't help it, if he tried. But we're coming to one that'll try his nerves now, I see."

The leap which stretched itself before them was a wide deep ditch, with a precipitous bank of five feet, and a high rail fence, standing four yards from the bank.

William just cleared the rasper; but his horse knuckled upon his knees as he came to the ground, and almost unseated his rider.

"Touch and go," said Mr. Bolton.

William turned his head to see who would dare the bold attempt.

Now it was Jack's turn. With compressed lips, and determination fixed in every feature, he approached the fence. His impatient horse tried to rush at it, but he held him with a steady hand, and, as he showed symptoms of swerving on the brink, Jack's new spurs were lanced into his sides, and he flew over with the lightness of a bird.

"Beautifully done!" exclaimed Tom, preparing to have "a go" at it.

Steadily his old experienced hunter stretched out his long neck, and gathered himself for the mighty spring; but, as he took it, the horse slipped, and fell head over heels into the ditch, sending the old whipper-in into the air like a shuttlecock. Down he plumped on the other side of the bank, into a convenient quagmire.

"Are you hurt?" asked the squire, pulling up his horse.

"No, sir, no," replied Tom, rising, and catching hold of the rein.

"Are you quite sure?" asked Wilmott, who, with Titley and several others, came to a stand-still.

"For God's sake, gentlemen, ride on!" said the old whipper-in, energetically, putting his foot in the stirrup, and remounting. "I'm not even scratched," continued he; "and if I, or even the king of England, was killed, you shouldn't stop. For'ard, for'ard," hallooed Tom again urging his horse to the jump.

With much care the foiled horse prepared for his second venture. With flashing eye he measured the distance, and stretched each nerve and sinew as he rose from the earth. "Over!" cheered Tom, lifting his whip-hand, and landing safely on the opposite side of the rail.

We cannot follow the fortunes of the whole field on this eventful day. It is enough that the old whipper-in was fatally stricken, though not until he had performed wonders. He had found in Trim-bush a second Merryman, and he had presented the brush to the regenerated Titley, ere he dropped from his horse, to the dismay and deep grief of all present. He would not permit any "physic-merchant" to be sent for, and contemplated his approaching end like a sylvan philosopher—

"I tell you, squire, and all of ye, that my run is over; and it has been a long and merry one."

"Don't think so," said the squire, with tears swimming in his eyes; "you'll be better soon."

"No, sir," replied the old whipper-in, shaking his head and looking towards the west at the setting sun, as he threw his long burnished shadows upon the earth. "I shall never see him set again," continued he.

"What shall I do?" asked William, much distressed.

"Bear the separation like a man, Will," replied his father; "and, when I am gone, let no whining regret remain with you for a day. A Bolton," continued the old whipper-in, while his eyes sparkled again, "mustn't act a soft part long."

"We had better get him home as soon as possible," said Titley.

"Yes," added Wilmott; "for I fear the attack is as serious as poor Tom thinks it to be."

"I can ride with a little support," said the old whipper-in, "if you'll bind this handkerchief round my beating temples."

The squire dipped the handkerchief in the water, and twisted it tightly round as desired.

"We'll lift you on the saddle, Tom," said he; "and I'll hold you on one side, while William shall on the other."

"Thank you kindly, sir," replied the old whipper-in.

Slowly, and with much care, they lifted him on his horse, and turned his head towards home.

With measured tread, the mournful party made in the direction of Scurfield Hall. Jack led the pack a few yards before them; but Trim-bush kept close to the old whipper-in. The hound seemed to comprehend that something had occurred to his much-loved master. Occasionally, he gazed in his face, and uttered a piteous cry, and tried to gain his attention by every means in his power. At length he succeeded. The old whipper-in saw the sorrow of his favourite, and looking at him fondly, said,—

"Poor Trim-bush! there's no try back here. We must go when called for, Trim-bush."

The novel is not nearly concluded, nor are any of the mysteries cleared up, yet, properly speaking, the leading interest closes with the death of Tom Bolton. The squire visits him by day-dawn next morning—

"Go, Will, and bring Trim-bush here," said the old whipper-in, "I'm childish enough to wish for him. And, while you are gone to the kennel, tell Fanny that I would be alone with the squire."

William left to obey his father's behest, and the old whipper-in, taking his master's hand, looked earnestly in his face, and said—

"A man who disguises the truth from himself, is worse than a fool, sir. And, if he permits others to blindfold him, there's no excuse for his folly. I know my hour has almost come, and I'm not afraid of the near, mysterious change. To attempt to persuade me that such is not the case, is useless; and, instead of unavailing endeavours to avoid the shaft of death, I will spend my brief allotted time in preparing for it."

The squire sobbed audibly.

"Ah, sir," continued Tom; "'tis hard, very hard, for good old friends to part. But part they must. The father from the son, the husband from the wife, the child from its mother—all are doomed to separate."

The old whipper-in paused to recover strength, and then continued, while the squire wept in silence.

"I made my own will ten years ago," said the old whipper-in smiling. "Through your liberality, sir, Will is left something handsome. My whip, spurs, and punch-bowl, squire, I've left to you. The fox-head drinking-cup is for Miss Kate, God bless her! And you'll find, sir, for I've been bold enough to make you my executor, none have been forgotten in Tom Bolton's last will and testament."

He rested, and seemed distressed for breath. The squire buried his face in his hands, to conceal his grief, and was almost overcome as the old whipper-in proceeded.

"My funeral is what I wished to speak to you about, alone, sir. It would break poor Will and Fanny's hearts to hear me mention it. Let my earth be made on the corner of the path as you enter the church, under the old yew-tree. It's a cool, shady spot in summer, and in winter it's always green. There let me be carried, with my boots, cap, and coat, upon my coffin; and it will be as well if my whip and spurs are added. Many a Bolton's been buried with these honours," said the old whipper-in proudly.

Again he stopped, and then continued—

"No long, dingy, undertaker's cloaks must be there. Let each man be dressed in pink at Tom Bolton's earthing; and, instead of white faces and weak tears, let all give a 'woo-hoop!' as I'm lowered beneath the turf, that the woods shall ring again with it. If Will could wind a mort, I should be better pleased; but I fear, poor boy, he won't be able. The crack-hounds—those we had yesterday, Sir—I should like to be led by Jack, a short distance before me; and if Trim-bush should want to go by the side of those who carry me, I hope he'll be permitted."

The old whipper-in sank gently back upon his pillow as he concluded his instructions. A ghastly paleness had spread itself over his countenance, and the squire started up with the apprehension that he was dying, when a slight pressure of the hand which he seized assured him it was but temporary exhaustion.

"Not yet, squire, not yet," whispered he.

"Would you like to see the doctor again?" asked the squire.

"Not for the world, sir," replied the old whipper-in. "I wouldn't have him in this chamber again for the world. Faugh! the cuckoo humbug!" exclaimed he, with an expression of as much disgust as his strength would allow.

"But you must see my friend the curate," said the squire.

"Well, sir, for respectability's sake, I will," replied the old whipper-in. But you know I've my own particular notions concerning religion. I'm not what may be called a thorough-bred Christian."

"A better one doesn't breathe," responded his master.

"You're good enough to say so, sir," rejoined the old whipper-in. "But I don't think the minister would give me such a character."

"Your character, Tom," said the squire, "when you quit my service, will get you a place aloft."

"Wherever it may be," replied Tom, "I hope we may be together some day."

"With all my heart," added the squire.

We wonder in what English hunting county Squire Scourfield's estates may lie. Mr. Mills, we notice, dedicates his novel to the Duke of Beaufort. We shall close our specimens with poor Tom's funeral, which winds up the sporting scenes; and the remainder of the work, sinks into that ordinary style which pleases, or is imagined to please, novel readers; though we can assure novel writers that, when a Squire Scourfield and his dependents are presented in this manner to their customers, the most romantic readers can relish them.

It was a week from the day of the old whipper-in's death that Jack sat at the breakfast-table in his mother's cottage, with deep sorrow portrayed in his thoughtful features. He rested his head upon one hand, while the other grasped a wooden spoon, in a basin of bread and milk standing before him. But none was lifted to his lips, and he seemed lost in a deep reverie. Mrs. Tiggie sat rocking herself to and fro before the expiring embers on the hearth, and held the corner of her checked apron to her watery eyes.

"Take something, John, dear," said she, upon seeing the unusual circumstance of Jack's hesitation in commencing his morning meal.

"You'll not be able to go through with it if you don't," continued Mrs. Tiggie, with a stifled sob at the conclusion.

Jack heeded not the request, but remained gazing at the spoon vacantly. He was dressed in his new livery, and his cap and whip were placed on a chair by his side.

The morning was beautiful. The glad sunshine streamed upon field and flood, and the air, smelling of sweet flowers, was filled with the songs of the wild birds. The noisy cawing of the rooks, as they wheeled round the aged oaks, mingled with them, and Nature looked decked as for a holiday.

No one in the village, or in the vicinity of the Hall, would labour to-day. The ploughshare remained buried in the earth, and the harrow courted not its surface. The shepherd unfolded the flock; but no snatch of an old ballad came from his lips; neither did his shrill whistle sound in the breeze. Children spoke in whispers to each other, and looked as if they ought not to play. Sturdy rustics stood idling in the lane; but no rude story caused a boisterous laugh among them; each spoke to the other seriously, and all wore an expression of sadness. Their hearts were heavy.

A shadow was cast upon the floor of the cottage, which roused Jack from his thoughtful mood. The "event" was the arrival of Peter Bumstead. The gamekeeper's face was white and long, and he moved his head mournfully as he shook hands with Jack, and saluted his mother. He had on a new black velvet shooting-jacket, snow-white knee breeches, and a pair of bright leather leggings.

"You look very nice and handsome-like," said Mrs. Tiggie. "I wish the occasion was a happier one," concluded the good dame, again applying the corner of her spotted apron to the unshed tears that were swimming in her eyes.

"Ah, Mrs. T!" exclaimed the gamekeeper with a groan deep and loud, "these are my wedding garments. I never thought they would be mounted for the first time at a funeral."

"As our good parson says," rejoined Mrs. Tiggie, "an all-wise power interferes even in the fall of a swallow's nest." How fortunate it was we put off our marriage! Only to think if we had been made one on the day named!"

"Dreadful wouldn't express it," said Peter. "As long as we lived, our wedding-day would have been a melancholy anniversary."

Jack sighed deeply.

The church-bell tolled. Its sad tone vibrated on many an ear. The same sound boomed far and wide, as it had sent from its muffled tongue in years faded from recollection. The old man heard that time-worn bell when his mother was lowered into the humble grave—the mound now sunk almost level with the earth; and as it was now echoed in his heart, a tear of fond remembrance fell. The widow listens to the mournful note. Again it dies upon the breeze. Long, long since she heard it tremble in the air, for one who plighted his heart to hers in days gone by. Memory recalls the happy hours of her youth. Once more she treads the daisied path with him she loved. Again his love-tale is breathed into her willing ear. The old bell sounds again in his moss-grown tower. The widow weeps—she is alone and friendless.

Poor Jack could not contain his grief in silence any longer. Thrice the bell struck, when he sprang from his chair, and hurried from the room to give vent to the swollen sorrow in his heart.

"Poor John!" exclaimed Peter; "he's wholly done brown."

"He is, indeed," added Mrs. Tiggie. "I don't know how he'll get through, poor chap."

"I'll watch him with a father's tenderness," said the gamekeeper; "and all the comfort I can give him I will."

"I know it, dear Bumstead," replied Mrs. Tiggie. "You'll make a good parent to him."

"And to some more I hope," rejoined Peter.

"For shame, sir," added Mrs. Tiggie, turning aside her head, and looking on the floor for a pin.

Slowly a gentleman, mounted, and dressed in scarlet, now passed the cottage door. Then another followed, and after him a group of three came.

"They're on their way to the Hall, I see," said Peter.

"Do they meet there?" inquired Mrs. Tiggie.

"Yes, ma'am," replied the gamekeeper. "It was the squire's orders that all was to be got ready there first."

Jack reappeared, and, taking his cap and whip, proceeded on his road to the kennel.

"Stop, John, stop," said his mother, as he hurried away without saying a word. "You must have something to eat first."

But her son only waved his hand backwards in refusal, and continued his way towards the kennel. One by one he selected the same hounds that hunted on the day the old whipper-in joined them for the last time, and, keeping them close to his heels, he led the pack on to the lawn.

A curtain was drawn before each gothic window of the old mansion, and all was quiet within its walls. The domestics walked on tiptoe through the rooms, and scarcely more sounds were heard than if the whole were deserted.

The hounds, under the superintendence of Jack, were assembled before the porch, as the hall clock struck nine, together with all the gentlemen in the habit of hunting regularly with the squire. All were talking of the merits of the old whipper-in, the reminiscences of the fun he occasioned, his eccentricities, and the dashing runs they had had with him. At length the squire emerged, leaning on the arms of Wilmott and Titley.

"Gentlemen," said the squire, lifting his hat as all saluted him, "we'll proceed to poor Tom's cottage, and those who wish to see him for the last time in his peaceful sleep can do so."

According to the old whipper-in's request, all were equipped for the chase. From head to foot not a thing was wanting.

In the course of an hour they had taken a parting look at Tom Bolton, the whipper-in—as the squire truly said, "in his peaceful sleep;" for there was a calmness spread over his features like that of a slumbering infant, as he lay wrapped in the arms of death. No distorted muscle was there to show the desperate struggle between life and death; but a placid smile was fixed in the stiffened lips, and told that the old whipper-in died as he had lived—in peace.

William for some time was inconsolable. His master, however, with the assistance of Fanny, at length restored his self-possession; and, when the procession was ready to move, he displayed his sincere grief silently.

The arrangement was to the letter as the old whipper-in directed. Before the coffin Jack conducted all the favourite hounds, except Trimbush, who whined restlessly by the side of the bearers. Then came the body, borne by Peter Bumstead, Striver, and two strong yeomen. Upon the sweeping pall Tom's cap, coat, whip, and spurs were placed. Immediately following him was his son. The squire, Wilmott, and Titley came after him; two by two the gentlemen of the hunt, amounting to upwards of a hundred, followed; and bringing up the rear was a crowd of rustics and children.

As they passed the Hall, Kate and Agnes peeped from a window at the funeral. Their eyes rested but a moment upon the array; tears came to them, and both wept long for the old whipper-in.

Round a deep grave, under the dark green yew-tree, all stood in silence, while the curate read the burial-service. The hounds were kept a little back until it was concluded, when, at a sign from the squire, Jack brought them to the side of the grave.

"Can you wind a mort, William?" said the squire.

The huntsman took his slung horn, and tried—but the first note was the last. Letting it fall from his lips, he shook his head and replied, "I can't do it, sir."

"Then, gentlemen," rejoined the squire, "we'll give poor Tom the last halloo. Take the time from me."

In a wide circle they stood round the grave. The hounds with Jack were in the middle, when a simultaneous "Woo-hoop!" burst from every tongue. For miles that sound was heard. Vale and hill rung with the echoing shout. From wood to wood the rattling wind carried the halloo, till all Nature seemed to join in the pealing cry. On, on, it went, till it died on the ear far away.

So ended the last scene of Tom Bolton, the old whipper-in.

About the close of the same year we find the old trapper and his beloved companion in the following position:—

With a yawn, Striver rose from his recumbent posture, under the pollard tree, rubbing his eyes.

"We can't stand work, Button, as we used," said he. "No, no. Old age has crept upon us, hasn't it Button?"

Button stretched himself upon the grass, and, after treating himself with a refreshing roll, deigned to give a reply by drooping his tail and shaking his head.

"Ah!" rejoined his master, "very true. It has, indeed. But never care, we have had our day, and there must be a settling to every reckoning, Button."

The old trapper stooped and groaned, as he gathered up his spade.

"Across the loins I feel it most," continued he. "I don't know your weak point, but I expect the loss of those teeth is the one that troubles you the most."

Button whined.

"So I thought," observed Striver; "it's a pity a fellow of your pluck should be without grinders. But they're worn out, Button, so it's no use grumbling."

While the trapper was speaking, his attention was attracted to the flight of a heron above his head. The lanky bird was poised high in air, and a speck was just visible hovering about him.

"Here's a bit of sport I love to see," said Striver, "although I'd rather have that hawk's head under my heel."

At this moment the brawny figure of Peter emerged from the side of a copse hard by. A gun was in his hand, and he strode with giant steps towards Striver, who, seeing him approach, pointed to the warring birds. The keeper nodded, and beckoned with his finger for Striver to meet him.

"Let's hide ourselves here," said Peter, getting behind a tree; "I may get a fly at that chap in a minute or two."

The hawk was now above the head of his prey, when down he stooped, like an arrow at his victim. But the crafty heron slanted, and escaped the blow. In a graceful bend the falcon wheeled from his rapid descent, and mounted again after the fleeing bird.

We cannot follow every minute evolution in this aerial combat, which is dramatically painted. It is enough that Peter at length marks down the falcon, and the stricken heron is permitted to recover itself and soar away homeward, when Striver remarks—

"Yonder's Mr. John Tiggle; I suppose he's going to the kennel."

"No doubt," replied Peter, "for I saw his mate, the huntsman, go that way just now."

They say it's a bouncing boy Mrs. B.'s got," remarked Striver.

"My wife told me a regular clipper, and she was nurse, you know," replied the keeper. "It's the image of his poor grandfather, she says," continued he.

"I'm glad of it," rejoined Striver.

"I've been thinking of old Tom's queer notions concerning religion," said Peter, with an air of solemnity.

"What of them?" asked Striver.

"He might be right, you know; there's no telling," replied the keeper.

"Well, and if he was!" said the trapper.

"Why, then, who can say the young whipper-in isn't the old one in a fresh mould?" replied Peter, deliberately.

We have not, as we have noticed, touched upon the mere novel, nor even hinted at the plot. It also is connected with sporting, though of another species. Yet the racy specimens we have given will, we imagine, bear out the high praise which we consider due to The Old English Gentleman.

CLASS SCHISMS, AND WAYWARD WORKMEN.

EVERYBODY laments class schisms ; and the waywardness of working-men is just now the favourite theme of well-fed philanthropy. The cure seems, to us almost as far off as ever, though the disease is daily greater. Even the most disinterested and hopeful efforts at amendment are thwarted by the untoward ignorance of the men of the masses. The fault lies entirely with the more enlightened. Our best meaning Reformers, and our most zealous pacifiers, start, it is true, in the enterprise of conciliation with an exuberance of beautiful benevolence ; but it is far too often wanting in stamina : it breaks down at the first or second rough repulse. Our middle-class philanthropists appear, generally, unmindful of the truth, that their want of success is an evidence of the need for and utility of their exertions ; that what unnerves their efforts is precisely what ought to strengthen and stimulate them. The working-classes meet advances with repulse, simply because advances are too rarely made. They have been left so long to gangrene in grievance, and grow sulky in neglect, that they are naturally and necessarily slow to understand and embrace kindness—kindness, moreover, tendered by the class with whom they have grown up in antagonism. It is provoking, perhaps, to have one's olive branches repelled as rods in disguise : patriots are not unnaturally disconcerted at being received as traitors. But is it unnatural that so it should be ? Is it possible that it should be otherwise ? Ten years are scarcely passed since the working-classes were appealed to, fondled, courted, cajoled, banqueted, harangued, flattered, used,—and duped. All Whig aristocracy went down on its knees to working-class power, and petitioned acceptance as its champion. Working-class power complied, and has been diddled ever since : at least it thinks so, and the effect is the same ; and, according to all human nature on record, or experience, that effect is an unqualified, hearty, stubborn, dogged distrust of all men and parties belonging, or bearing resemblance, to the betrayers. There is a ten years' accumulation of distrust in workmen. Our sins against them have been grave and manifold. So long as we could use them to our purposes, we evoked their passions. We excited a lust for power by the bait of reform, and left it, inflamed by disappointment and undisciplined by intelligence, at the mercy of every agent of mischief and anarchy. We have sowed the wind and are reaping the whirlwind, untempered by any care of ours to curb its force or to guide its power.

We stand on the brink of that mighty river,
Whose waves we have tainted with death.
It is fed from the depths of a thousand dells,
And around us it foams, and rages, and swells.

The working-class mind is a chaos of doubt and darkness. The depth of distrust, and the obstinacy of error, will not lightly yield even to the sincerest efforts of enlightened compassion. Nor are these natural obstacles alone to be surmounted. There are vicious men, of no small mental power, whose interests lie, or seem to lie, in the conflict of classes ; and to whose leadership the repulsion of respectability is vital. It is their vocation to dissever.

We do not enlarge on the magnitude of the mischief, to alarm, but to incite the perseverance of peace-makers, by showing why success is necessarily distant, why effort ought to be redoubled, and why benevolence must not be disheartened. The kindly influences will prevail, but they must be continuous and long-suffering. Repulse upon repulse must be borne and accepted as an evidence of the deficiency, and not of the uselessness of exertion.

An attempt was made at Leeds last month to rally the workmen there under one standard. Mr. J. G. Marshall presided. He is a millionaire mill-owner, a man aristocratically allied, and the manager of the largest factory in the world. Nevertheless a heartier sympathy exists not than his with working-men, or a more cordial advocacy of the liberties of labour. He was aided by Colonel Thompson, Hamer Stansfeld, and others anxious to elevate the condition of industry, in that appeal for union—an union between labour and capital. We need not stop to say, that until that union be effected, we shall in vain assail the ascendancy of misrule, based just now on the division of its foes. The proposal was twofold : hearty effort, on our part, for full and fair representation of the whole people in Parliament ; and, on theirs, coöperation in opposing the confiscation of the property of the working-classes by means of the Corn Laws. To this overture, no argument could induce them to accede ; the usual clap-traps of the Chartist orators were resorted to, and the Chartist amendment was carried.

We regret that so fair an offer of fellowship from the employing to the employed classes should have met with so little success ; but we are rejoiced to find that the good spirit which dictated the attempt, remained unabated by failure. Mr. Marshall, according to the report of The Leeds Times, in his concluding speech, remarked :—" I am willing to admit that in many cases, and I most deeply regret it, the higher classes, both what you term the aristocracy of the land and the aristocracy of the loom, have not treated the people in the manner which they deserve to be. (Hear, hear, hear.) They have imputed to the people base motives which they did not deserve. (Hear, hear.) Well, then, my friends, is it the part of reasonable men to copy their vices ? (Cheers.) Would it not be acting a far nobler part, and would it not be far more becoming your real strength, if you (the working-men) would prove to the mill-owners and to the aristocracy, that you can set them a better example? (Cheers.) I do not at all advise you to trust them in a foolish manner, and without any securities. What I complain of, or rather what I regret—for it is with deep regret that I see the result of this meeting—is, that you openly declare an unqualified distrust. That I do believe, in my conscience, is unfounded. I am convinced in my conscience, that you have been carried away by enthusiasm. I can sympathize with that enthusiasm, I can go a long way with you: but be not so far led away by it, as to commit the worst of all errors, that of doing wrong yourselves. (Cheers.) Keep yourselves in the right, intellectually and morally. Set an example to the higher classes, how they should treat you. Offer to meet them:—why should you not? What are you afraid of? Suppose we should meet you on fair terms, will you be any worse off than you are now? The greatest weakness of all classes of men, from the highest to the lowest, is, that they have not faith in what is right. (Cheers.)”

Principle so righteous and spirit so conciliatory and just as this, will make huge inroads into Chartism, and powerfully dissipate distrust. It has been too little the practice of mill-owners to meet and confer with workmen: it has been still less customary to address them in kindness and sympathy, the moment after overtures of fellowship were repelled. There is a Christianity in this which will tell. Compare it with the terms in which a Whig paper of note alluded to similar waywardness of hot-headed Chartists at Manchester. “They are a Ruffian party, against whom all sections of Reformers must unite.” It needed not the capital R, to make the ugly word ruffian more signally offensive. “A Ruffian party”! they are rough it is true; and they go wrong, very wrong, but they are likewise—and Whigs should not forget it—they are ignorant also, and Whiggery has had ten years ascendancy—at first with great power, and boundless means and opportunity for educating; and yet where are the acts then done by them to remove that ignorance, which still remains a fitter reproach to them than Chartists? If poor, suffering, blind, misled men are “ruffian,” what are they who with all light, and all power, and all profession of the duty of enlightenment, have yet left darkness, and caused the ruffianism? “If,” says the Whig print, “they could but proceed as they have been allowed to go on, they would establish an irresponsible power over assemblages of the people, compared with which the dragoons of the old Tory government, nominally responsible at least, were preferable. Their instrument of liberty is the greatest tyranny principle,” &c. We are strongly impressed with a belief that the calling of names is not a corrective of error. To call men, whom we have ourselves kept in ignorance, and made foolish, ‘tyrants, dragoons, or ruffians,’ seems the best possible mode of exciting passion, darkening the dawn of reason, and rendering improvement hopeless. Immediately beneath this unhappily conceived rebuke, we observe a letter, denouncing, in terms of no measured severity, the conduct of Journals, guilty of stimulating a bloody war between this country and America, severing the sympathies and ties which “common origin, language, religion, laws, and freedom,” have established between us. Charity, it strikes us, though excellent abroad, begins at home: at any rate, it were desirable that the sense of sympathy which dictates so just a feeling towards our American relatives, be at least as keen towards our brethren here; and at least as zealous of the concord between classes whose interests are common, and whose origin, country, and welfare, are identical. It is absurd to talk of Chartist feelings as those of a clique. Professed Chartists may be a limited body, but the errors and the wants which fraternize with Chartism are leviathan in breadth and depth. A victory—so it was weakly called—was obtained by the more sensible over the less rational portion of a public meeting at Manchester. The result was the defeat, to any useful purpose, of a subsequent anti-corn-law meeting. This all evidences a depth of disaffection which requires patient scrutiny and humane treatment; in short, the exercise of the mightiest powers which man wields,—those of kindness, and charity, and activity of benevolence. To these powers evils have yielded which cell and sword, rack and scaffold could not cure.

There appears to us to be but one root to the errors and evils of working-class waywardness. The want of faith in every other class. It is that which distances them from instruction; which enchains them to the leaders whose vocation it is to mislead, and whose credentials consist in their abuse of all other orders of society. It is the province of these men to feed the spirit of antagonism, for their power would end with the hostility which dissevers their followers from a better guidance and a truer wisdom. It has been said, and with a great show of truth, that if the Radical party were to become Chartists, and men like the Marshalls, were to adopt the five points—the O’Connors and O’Briens would go further still, and establish a cause of disunion. We are not prepared to subscribe to this belief; we are at least confident that neither then nor now could they maintain the severance of the two classes, were it not for the disunion in feeling subsisting between them—a disunion perilous as well as pernicious, for on it is based the strength of the monarchy of monopoly, and the powers of misgovernment.

The working-classes must be appeased, and in order to this they must be approached and humanized. Their affections must be gained, for their averseness bars access to their minds. We know of few cases where these means have been tried; but we know of none where they have failed.

An instance occurs to us in a northern county, where the employers of a mining population have adopted a complete system of moral and physical elevation. They have opened schools both in the evenings of the week-days, and on Sundays, for the instruction of the children. They have a large room devoted to the purpose, connected with their own house. This room serves also, on certain days, for the instruction of young men, and also for recreation. Chess, dominoes, the reading of periodical, and music, are among the chief of these amusements. The latter is an essential feature of the whole system. Several even of the young men and women who are employed in the neighbouring collieries are proficient in singing. Members of the family themselves instruct them. Concerts are occasionally given, at which they take their parts, along with some of the first chorus singers of the county. A horticultural society is also established. Prizes are given thrice every year at an exhibition: this tends to create a love of horticulture; and the habit of gardening in great measure acts as a substitute for the alehouse. A playground has been likewise opened; and this operates most favourably in a similar manner, as well as by affording a healthful muscular exercise. This system is kept alive by the personal intermixture of the family themselves. They do not hold their work-people at arm's length, but fraternize and sympathize with them, just as if they were their fellow-beings;—a solecism which monopolists will deride, but which those, who know the real interests of society, will hail as the only true means of securing them.

To Mr. Greg of Ashton high praise is due, for setting a similar example.

Rich results have attended both these efforts. Repellent roughnesses have been probably encountered; but these seem to have shown, to those who were seeking to soften, how great the duty of perseverance. Certainly the success has been great, and a really civilized population is growing out of a very few years' culture, promising a far richer harvest in prospect, and, in both cases, from a rugged soil.

We have thus exhibited what we believe to be the cure, and the only cure, for the existing gangrene preying on the vitals of society; for such is the evil of a disaffected working-class. The two elements of a nation are dissevered. Labour and capital are antagonist.

It is peculiarly unfortunate that, in towns, this disunion is most rife. From towns have the liberties of England sprung. Intelligence, the bulwark of freedom, arises there; and by towns must those rights be maintained. In the social communion and interchange of thought, and in the power of organized action, towns are the natural nurseries of liberty and light. It is essential that, being sources of weal or woe, they should be carefully tended. As respects the care of the employed by the employing classes, they are less so, perhaps, than in many villages, where a more patriarchal sympathy, though not an availing system of instruction, often prevails. The number of hands employed by a manufacturer seems to deter his exertions. It ought to stimulate them. We should gladly see some system for rendering the means of education compulsory on employers and parents, if it cannot be done as an act of duty. But there is more required than mere education: it is the evidence of real sympathy with the labourer, and of interest in his moral wellbeing, which will prove the only agent adequate to the removal of the existing feud, and the fallacies and national mischief it engenders. Without it, the working-classes will generally prove averse to listen, and slow to be convinced. Manifest evidence of kind feeling towards them will alone give them faith in honest instructors, or gain their ear to sound truths.

On machinery, for example, it is essential that instructors as to its real effects on labour have the confidence of those they teach. It is an error vitally mischievous—the belief of many of the working-classes that machinery injures them. It is one which it is difficult to remove; for the outward facts often confirm the prejudice entertained against machinery: whilst incendiary orators and leaders, as well as the madder portion of the Tories, diligently diffuse and abet the blunder.*

To obtain the union of the people against monopoly, we need more information and intelligence as to their true interest, among the masses. To obtain this information and intelligence, there is wanting faith in educated teachers; to this faith there is wanting a kindly persevering Christian and personal care and tendence of the humbler by the educated, and especially by the employing classes.

* Since the above remarks were written, a Lecture, entitled, "Monopoly and Machinery," has been delivered by Mr. Stansfeld of Leeds, and printed in a cheap form. It is exactly an instance of the efforts we desire to see universally and continuously made to uproot working-class errors by plain facts and lucid reasoning. A small pamphlet, entitled, "Corn and Wages," by R. N. B., published by Mr. Boone, of Bond Street, is another example of the kind of production essentially needed to the due explanation of the great principles which govern the working condition, and connect it inseparably with every other branch of industrial interest. This has seldom, if ever, been more plainly as well as logically done than in the tract to which we allude.

ADVENT-HYMN.

(Bringt mir Blut der Edlen Reben.—GERMAN AIR.)*

Lo, he comes!—Messiah neareth,
Jesus comes;
Not with pomp the God appeareth—
Meek he comes.

Pride displays no blazoned banners,
Vanity no false, fair manners,
When he comes.

Not with Conqueror's ring and rattle,
Wild war's glee;
Ushered by a bloody battle,
Cometh he.

As the West wind's gentle blowing
Wakes life's mystic power of growing,
Thus doth he.

* The words of Arndt, which are commonly sung to this air in Germany, are Bacchanalian; but those who have frequented the meetings of the Burschen in Germany, know that their social songs possess, in many instances, a solemn cathartic character, more fit for the Temple than for the beer-shop.

Cæsar, 'mid thy legion's thunder,
Dost thou hear?
Hark! from Heaven a hymn of wonder,
Full and clear:—
"Open wide the blissful portals—
Peace on Earth, goodwill to Mortals!"
Charms the ear!

Rome, beneath thy glittering armour,
Grimly gored;
Iron Father, bloody charmer,
Sheath the sword!
Shall thy natal wolf still claim thee?
Lo! I send a power to tame thee,
Saith the Lord.

Forms of vain will-worship mumbling,
Priests, have done!
Creeds with creeds incongruous jumbling:
Know the one!
See the end of all confusion,
Common truth of all delusion,
In The Son!

Vainly sundering walls thou raisest,
Pharisee!
Orthodox, in vain thou praisest
Bound to thee!
Nought is isolated, single,
All in brothered rays doth mingle
Under me.

Subtle Doctors sagely fooling
Humankind,
With crude dogmas harshly schooling
Infant mind;
Kick the solemn architecture!
Vainly shall a blind director
Lead the blind.

Wise men, something still conceiving
Like the true,
Busy brains still idly weaving
Something new;
Like a star in strength upahooting,
I the end of all disputing
Shew to you!

Gape not! gaze not! I display not Dazzling shows;
With loud logic I gainsay not
Wrangling foes.
Noiseless victories ye shall win you!
Love Heaven-planted—look within you,
There it grows!

Little seed! thy hidden virtue
Stirs Time's womb;
The bright promise thou art heir to
Lights the tomb:
Now the unnoticed dust thee covers,
Soon, the sought of many lovers,
Thou shalt bloom.

Simple Truth! while brilliant blanders
Fools achieve,
Thou thy quiet chain of wonders
Wisely weave:
Where strong hate to love surrenders,
From the strife that pride engenders,
Work reprove.

From the hard rock let the fountain
Blithely dart!
Cleave the foul mist, move the mountain,
Faithful heart!
Let the stony frozen regions
Blush with life by high religion's
Magic art!

Kings shall own thee; knaves shall use thee;
Fools despise;
Babbling Doctors shall confuse thee,
Artless wise:
Rival sages shall, in duty,
On thy common web of beauty,
Stamp their dyes.

Go! and though my hope deceive me,
In thy plan
I will hope; I will believe thee
While I can.
Go and conquer!—If thou win not,
Earth may crack, and God will sin not Cursing Man.

COLONEL MAXWELL'S RUN THROUGH THE UNITED STATES.*

COLONEL MAXWELL might have called his run a gallop. It was literally one; during which he was elevated into a state of buoyant exhilaration, of dancing spirits, which, in a naturally joyous temperament, is ever the consequence of rapid locomotion.

His run was made in the months of August and September of last year, during a period of relaxation from military duty; which, as he was then stationed in New Brunswick, had been rendered arduous and delicate by the trust reposed in him by the Lieutenant-governor, Sir John Harvey, in the arrangement of the Boundary Question. His semi-diplomatic duties appear to have been discharged in a manner which gave the highest satisfaction to all parties concerned; with admirable good sense, happy tact, and in a frank and conciliatory spirit. The intelligent and respectable part of the American citizens were thus prepared to give the military negotiator the kindest possible reception; and he went among them in the best possible disposition to be pleased. Besides these preparatives, he entered the States under the fairest auspices, recommended by Sir John Harvey to General Winfield Scott, the American commander-in-chief on the eastern frontier. General Scott gave him letters to every eminent person worth knowing in the range of his tour; and he seems to have been hailed with universal acclaim.

Colonel Maxwell's tour extended to Washington; but, in the first place, accompanied by one or two brother officers, also on leave—after the Boundary wars of the Maine were imagined to be over—he came from New Brunswick to Boston by steam, with, as we have said, the best disposition possible to be pleased with everything, and in happy ignorance of what he was to see, and of the adventures and observations of all preceding English travellers, without one exception. He had read none of their books; he had imbibed neither the senseless prejudices of some of them against the Yankees, nor the prepa-

sessions of others for Democracy and Voluntarism. He was prepared to judge for himself, in the spirit of candour and good-sense. If he carried one impression more strongly along with him than another, it was one which we wish to see universal, and which it is the best tendency of his pleasant volumes to deepen. It is thus stated in his preface—

It is a matter of first-rate importance that two of the greatest nations on the globe, springing from one common stem, speaking the same language, and united by the same faith, should lay aside all remnants of hostile feelings, natural in their origin, but which have been far too long retained; and, by a warm and generous union, augment the strength and the resources of both.

At this particular crisis, we rejoice to be able to say, that Colonel Maxwell found these sentiments warmly reciprocated by every American with whom he conversed; and this circle included many of the most distinguished and influential of the citizens. The topic was naturally introduced wherever he appeared, from the part he had so recently acted in the Maine Boundary question; and uniformly with the same result. At an anniversary dinner, given by the Cambridge University, shortly after his arrival in the United States, he says—

I had a long and interesting conversation with my new acquaintances opposite, President Quincy and Judge Story, and we agreed that we belonged to the same great national family, and were bound to consider ourselves near relations. The Boundary question was brought forward, and they all seemed to be aware of the responsible part I had played in it. Other topics were introduced, all breathing respect, good feeling, and affection for our mutual fatherland.

At a public dinner at Troy, General Winfield Scott, in proposing the health of his late gallant adversary, the Lieutenant-governor of New Brunswick, after paying some high-flown compliments, remarked—

“He has recently preserved the peace of two great nations: he has preserved, by his wise policy, those friendly relations which ought ever to exist between mother and daughter; and in averting the evils of war between Great Britain and America, he has not only aided the best interests of humanity, but may be said to have preserved the peace of the whole world. I drink, gentlemen, most cordially to the health of Sir John Harvey, and I am satisfied that you will respond to my toast in brimming glasses.”

On the same evening, on their way home, the conversation turned to the subject so important to both countries; when Colonel Maxwell was enabled to report thus satisfactorily of the sentiments of one of the first military citizens of America:—

The conversation turned upon the subject of peace or war, on which General Scott spoke in a noble and disinterested manner. He said he never could believe that any Englishmen would wish to see their country plunged in war for the chance of getting a riband or a star, nor would the greatest reward that his country could give induce him to desire it.

He then expatiated on the great loss that would be sustained by both countries; that America took annually seventeen millions of our manufactures; and that, although his country had the expectation this year of a most superabundant harvest, and many speculators expected England to have a bad one, yet still the idea that any advantage to America could result from a rupture with us was a mistaken one, for he considered the interests of the two nations to be so blended, that on the prosperity of England depended that of the United States, arguing from the great effect a dearth would have on the currency question. This he did clearly and forcibly; but I have neither time nor political economy enough at my fingers' ends to do his argument justice.

He then spoke, with great animation, of the strong wish of the President, of the Congress, and of the country generally, to preserve peace with England; in illustration of which, he described to me, but without any ostentation, the manner he was received on his return from adjusting the Border differences with his “valued friend, Sir John Harvey.” On reaching Washington, he said, the President requested him to fix a day to dine with him; this he respectfully declined, and Mr. Van Buren then named one, inviting all the cabinet ministers and foreign diplomatists to meet him, which was specified in their cards of invitation. He was placed on the right hand of the President, who took wine with him first, and all the ambassadors in rotation asked him, as a tacit acknowledgment that their respective governments were desirous of peace, and that all approved of his efforts to maintain it.

This conversation originated in my having mentioned that Sir John Harvey had received the thanks of the Queen's government on the occasion.

He mentioned, as another conclusive proof of the good feeling of the country, that not much business was done in Congress on the day he reached Washington, and that most of the Members came to him to greet him; and he ended by again emphatically repeating, “I only mention these circumstances to prove the sincere desire of my country for peace.”

We went home with him, and, after tea, he got up a whist-party for us; and both he and the good-humoured commander-in-chief, who has much wit and sweetness of manner, permitted Captain O— to take their likenesses; and a most agreeable evening concluded a delightful and interesting day.

General Scott entered with me very fully into the Boundary question, and his views regarding it; and ended by saying, “his friend Harvey and he could settle it in half an hour, over their first bottle of wine.”

He also spoke of his treaties with the Indians. A detestation of chicanery, and a love of fair and open dealing characterized all he said.

It is with no ordinary satisfaction that we transcribe this conversation. It must put all the British world in the happiest humour for following Colonel Maxwell's rapid march; and for enjoying the lighter parts of his narrative.

The canvass, previous to General Harrison's election to the Presidency, was going hotly forward during Colonel Maxwell's tour; and Daniel Webster was quite as ubiquitous and eloquent as our own Daniel before a general election. As this gentleman, if he live long, must play a high part in American politics, and is already one of the most eminent statesmen in America, much as has been written and said about him of late, both during his residence among us, and by recent travellers, we are induced to copy out the impressions which he made on the fresh and unbiassed mind of our gallant author, when he first met him in New York.

I this day had the honour of being presented, by Mr. E. Curtis, to the great Daniel Webster, in one of the long passages of this hôtel,* of which the great Dan is an inmate; he received me most graciously, as he also did my friend Major B—, and invited us to his room, where he introduced us to Mrs. Webster. Our fellow-traveller, Captain O—, had by this time started for Boston, the long-looked-for leave not having arrived.

* Astor House, New York.

Had he remained, I could have favoured you with a sketch of the American (not the Irish) Dan's head.

His eye, his forehead, his black matted hair, and olive complexion, reminded me somewhat of the impression made on me by Napoleon. He seemed to be in bad health, was labouring under a violent cold, and absolutely in a state of exhaustion, brought on by his great political exertions in favour of General Harrison. He is now doing duty as a regular itinerant orator in favour of that party, and is to be delivered of a speech to the inhabitants of this city on Tuesday, the 29th instant, at the Merchants' Hall, in Wall Street; I have, therefore, put off my intended departure for Philadelphia, for the express purpose of hearing him. I have also been pressed by Judge McClean and Mr. Auchinloos to be present at some good speaking to-morrow on board the British Queen, where the wits of America are to be congregated.

I had a long conversation with Mr. Webster about the Boundary question; the gist of what he said was, that he considered all the additional surveys of the disputed territory needless and procrastinating: and when I alluded to the argument I have just stated to you, regarding our communications, he replied that "the whole of the business ought to be arranged and set at rest as amicably and with the same ease as two country gentlemen would settle any question regarding contiguous property, and so adjusting their marckes"—this was the term he used—"as would be most useful to each other—a fair exchange being no robbery."

Now, mark me, my dear friend. Do not think that I am led away by all this fine talk. I know well how differently and determinedly he spoke in Congress. Nor am I beguiled by all the fine speeches which have been perpetually made to me since I have been here, that as long as their national honour is not touched, the Union will never go to war with England for a few dirty acres claimed by the State of Maine, never!—that they are five-and-twenty States to one against her; that the subject is comparatively of no importance; and so forth. We of the old country have, all of us, been brought up a great deal too much in the belief that the Yankees are proverbially deceitful. I do not think that they are a grain more so than other people; and I firmly believe that all that was said to me was truly meant, and came from the heart at the moment. But they are very fickle, and very proud, and very irritable, and the first political wind that gets up may blow away all these fine determinations of equity and liberality.

Mr. Webster talked of his visit to England in a manner which proved that he had been much pleased with it; he also discussed a very interesting subject, the new route to Southern Australia, via this great continent; and we retired much pleased with our reception.

On descending to the political arena, I again heard the fervent declaration made by these conservative Whigs—and no other creed durst show its nose in this Harrisonian hot-house!—"that the moment the battle's won—which they all declare it is sure to be—and the old General seizes the helm of the State, a new system will be developed, having for its object peace and perpetual union with England!!!"

Though the old General has gone the way of all flesh, happily his enlightened policy survives him; and we would fain hope in equal vigour.

In the course of his subsequent journey to Philadelphia, Baltimore, and other places, Colonel Maxwell several times, and indeed with laughable frequency, fell in with the itinerant orator, generally sleeping in the corner of a railway carriage; while, after delivering a harangue in one place, he posted on to address another audience; snatching food and rest where he could.

Those aristocratic tendencies or weaknesses in the Anglo-American character which have been noticed by nearly every British traveller, and which pertain as much to frail universal humanity as to the citizens of the States of New York and Pennsylvania, have not escaped the notice of Colonel Maxwell, who states—

I have never read any modern travels in this country, consequently, except by hearsay, I have no notion of what may be the opinions of others better informed than myself; but this I know, that all, absolutely ALL, as if it were a mania lately and spontaneously sprung up, have either been recounting to me the deeds of their ancestors, as connected with the mother country, or claiming and proving a direct descent from her. All-republican as they believe themselves to be, I consider them the proudest and most aristocratic people I ever beheld; detesting and turning up their noses at what they consider and stigmatize as parvenus and plebeian. No coterie of old maids ever scrutinized birth, parentage, and pretensions more fastidiously than do the Americans. Wealth is eagerly sought for by them, perhaps more eagerly than in many other countries, and great respect is shown to it occasionally; but it has no chance against descent—as, not the least.

Everybody he met with, having a Scottish name, claimed ancestors of the best; and set up for a pedigree; to which distinction no doubt many of them are well entitled. Another American propensity, a natural consequence, indeed, of the popular form of the government, is the love of speech-making. Colonel Maxwell, while in New York, was invited to an entertainment, given on board the British Queen steamer:

The avowed object of the party being to inspect her machinery and accommodations; but the real one, to eat, drink, and speechify; at all three of which amusements the Americans are great adepts.

A Mr. Le Garé, of South Carolina, an eminent man, a first-rate author, and a splendid orator, was the lion for the morning; and I really believe, from what took place afterwards, that he himself was the only person present who was not aware of this.

I was soon ushered into a large room, where the party was collecting, and saw a very interesting assemblage of open countenances and intellectual heads, belonging to men from every State in the Union; to all of whom I was presented in rotation. Among the rest were young Webster, very like his talented father; Mr. Sibley, who is styled the "Lion of the West;" Mr. John Neale of Maine, an author, an orator, and a legislator; and General Mercer of Virginia, a very talented man and a capital speaker; and many other distinguished persons, to whom I had been previously introduced.

A great many carriages were in waiting to convey us; and we soon found ourselves on board this new wonder of the world. Captain Roberts, her commander, a thorough-going sailor, did the honours well; directing our attention to everything which was novel in her construction, and explaining her stupendous machinery with great clearness and precision. He afterwards, with honest triumph, showed us silver speaking-trumpets, gold snuff-boxes, diplomas, and all manner of other trophies accorded to him as having been the first to direct the powers of steam so far across old Neptune's bosom, and thus conquering the wide barrier that had so long separated the two countries, which, during the evening, I heard repeatedly and emphatically termed "mother and daughter."

England, I should think, never before received such a flood of incense as was showered at her feet on this occasion. No son was ever prouder of the deeds of his father than America seemed to be of Old England; and I declare the exhibition of good feeling was perfect. Every spokesman alluded to their fatherland, and the great prospects opening out on this continent by its being brought closer to England by the powers of steam.

When all and every part of the noble vessel had been inspected, we assembled in the state cabin, where lunch was provided, and the champagne began to sparkle. I happened to be placed on a sofa near Mr. Le Garé, and I heard several hints given to him that he was expected to speak: he has the look of a quiet, modest man, and evidently shrunk from the display; however, no denial would be taken, and his health was proposed and drunk with great cheering. This still would not do, until he was vociferously called for. He then spoke, and very eloquently, comparing steam to an additional Apostle of the Gospel, which would eventually be the means of bringing all religions under one church, thus collecting all stray sheep into the one fold: he also said that sooner or later the whole world would worship God in the English language.

General Starkweather spoke well; General Mercer eloquently; and little John Neale, of Maine, was repeatedly on his legs, and acquitted himself well.

This little eloquent John Neale is, we presume, the same Yankee gentleman who fixed himself pertinaciously upon Jeremy Bentham, until the unfortunate philosopher was compelled to declare, that either he or his American guest must leave the house; and who afterwards amused his countrymen with holding up the harmless peculiarities of the kind-hearted and unsuspicious sage to ridicule. But Mr. Neale, if an unsafe guest, is a very great orator. He even inspired the stranger with a speech; albeit Colonel Maxwell was a modest soldier, and not an eloquent man, nor yet of an eloquent nation. He, however, when John Neale, "with his curly pow," gave "Colonel Maxwell, and the British service," acquitted himself famously.

I talked away upon all manner of subjects, the champagne producing both ideas and arrangement. I contrasted the two British Queens, the reigning and the floating; adverted to the very interesting situation in which they both then were—I thought of a brevet as I did so; and on I went, right and left, amidst continual cheering; and when I sat down, all the cups and saucers in all the steward's rooms rattled with the intensity of the applause. A multiplicity of hand-shakings followed; and—climax of Demosthenic glory!—after I had resumed my seat, young Dan came up to me, and requested I would accompany his father to the hustings in Wall Street.

I have now heard the sentiments of so many eminent and talented persons—very many more, I can assure you, than I have enumerated to you—that I feel justified in declaring that the feeling of respect for England, upon which I have often dwelt, is general and deeply fixed.

It is true I have not been much amongst the Loco-focos; but I conceive that Loco-focoism, if not in a dying state, is, at all events, much on the wane. However, so I must endeavour to hear what the Van Burenites have to say for themselves and about us, before I can decide.

"La causa e sempre à colui chi parla solo;"

Mr. Graham, in the course of conversation, gave us his lineal descent from the Duke of Montrose; even Mr. Le Garé relaxed, and said that he was himself born in London, and that his mother was a Swinton. This will corroborate what I have already stated respecting the strong feeling so prevalent in this country, and which must surely have its effect in cementing a too long-dissevered chain.

On the whole, Toryism, or what in America is termed Whiggism, (which is, in fact, everywhere nearly the same thing,) seems to be thriving apace among those of the citizens with whom Colonel Maxwell came into contact; but these were all of the higher class,—and it must not be forgotten that, in their country, the vote of Coat of frieze goes as far as that of Coat of gold.

Colonel Maxwell bears repeated testimony to the uniform civility, the genuine kindness and good conduct, of the whole citizens. He never saw a beggar, nor a person intoxicated—not even an Irishman.

More than half the helps are Irish, and I verily believe that all the hodmen are so; and that the out-of-doors work of this city, [New York,] as well as of many others in the Union, is principally performed by the sons of St. Patrick. Let me add, that I have as yet never seen one of them drunk—thanks to Father Mathew and the contempt in which this disgusting vice is held throughout the Union; and, by the by, let me tell you that the influence of this wonder-working Roman Catholic priest is extending beyond his own sphere of action; there is much less drunkenness in the army than there was; and I am proud to say, that the 17th of last March, St. Patrick's own day, passed without a single case of drunkenness having been reported to me.

Often and often was I told, before I started on this tour, "Oh, you like respect and attention,—you are rather sensitive,—you'll be put out every instant: the levelling system won't suit you; you'll be daily and hourly annoyed by their vulgarity and want of refinement." Now, in reply, I have only to declare, to make use of an American phrase, "I have never yet had my dander up, my choler excited, or my bile disturbed;" I never was where I found more to like and less to quarrel with.

And here let me say a few words for American travelling. Everything is arranged like clock-work: you start to a minute, and you arrive exactly at the time named. Your baggage is transferred, without trouble and without risk, from one train to another; porters and servants working for you with civil and kind aspects, and without expectation of fee or reward! Waiters at inns waiting upon you assiduously and serving you faithfully—no half-crowns or half-sovereigns looked for in return! We left that well-regulated house, the Tremont, without one glance of greed from any of its inmates, but many of kindness; and to get to this place we paid three dollars each, with no tippling of discontented cads, no litigation with insolent porters; and, to wind up all, I have now been a week and a day in the Union, and I have neither seen a beggar nor a drunkard!

I respectfully say to Messieurs and Mesdames who have written books on Yankee land, and the accounts of whose travels I mean to peruse when I have concluded my own, that I never saw a more delightful country nor a more charming people. If it and they had nothing more to recommend them, I say it is enough; and I here repeat, no drunken men, no impertinent beggars, no insolent boys, no eavesdroppers, no looking after strangers, for all are occupied with their own affairs.

If there are sects and sectarians, what care I, so as they keep the peace and I "go a-head!"

The same thing is repeated again and again. Yet this was during a period of great political excitement. After hearing Mr. Webster's eloquent address at a public meeting in behalf of Harrison, he relates—

Here the powerful Dan sat down, and received the greetings of his numerous friends; his cloak was thrown over him, and after a minute or two to recover himself, he departed, the air still ringing with the most deafening huzzas and cheers.

During this astonishing harangue, for such it certainly was, and I am well aware that my report of it is most imperfect, you might have heard a pin drop; silence, decorum, and attention were general throughout the assembled multitude. Nothing could possibly be stronger than the contrast between the stage in Wall Street and the hustings at Covent Garden; and when I remembered the scene which I myself had witnessed at a Westminster election, when as worthy and honourable a man as ever breathed offered himself to the people, I could not but blush for my countrymen. On that occasion, the sound of the distinguished and gallant soldier's voice, at whose elbow I was, and who spoke for three-quarters of an hour, was never heard by me, nor by a single soul present, being drowned amidst the frightful hootings and yellings, turnip-toppings, potato-shyings, and brick-battings that ensued.

And let me tell you that in New York this day political strife and excitement have been at as high pressure as they well could be on any occasion in the metropolis of England.

Let it also be remembered, that this was long before the reform bill was heard of.

Having said so much on the political feeling of America at that critical moment, we shall just dip into the more entertaining matter of these sprightly volumes, and glean a few of the remarks, illustrative anecdotes, and hasty opinions of the traveller on his Run.

Boston, the place at which he first touched, he fancied magnificent for an American town, until he had seen New York and the other great cities. Of the 102,000 inhabitants of Boston, the British consul, Mr. Grattan, informed him that 25,000 were native Irish. The weather was overpoweringly hot while Colonel Maxwell was at Boston, and he allayed its fervours by a new kind of luxurious enjoyment, "by," he owns—

Trying to cool myself by sucking mint juleps, and swallowing sherry cobbles.

I think I hear you exclaim, "Mint juleps and sherry cobbles! what the deuce are they?" I will not be severe, and say, with Milton,

"Not to know these argues yourself unknown!"

but will graciously dispel your ignorance on a very important subject. Be it known to you, then, that mint julep,—one of the best gifts of Providence in such a hothouse climate as this,—is a preparation consisting of sundry layers of mint leaves, placed among chipped ice, as pure and brilliant as crystal, and sprinkled over with two table-spoonfuls of powdered sugar, with a legère soupçon of brandy—the smallest possible glassful—to crown the whole.

The gradual extraction of this compound, as it becomes fluid, through the medium of a quill or a macaroni pipe, is, I can assure you, a most refreshing and harmless recreation, when the thermometer ranges between 80° and 100°.

The only thing to be feared is, lest the suspicion of the brandy should by degrees become a certainty: if you doubt your powers of self-control on this point, sherry cobbles must be your resource. They are similar in their fabrication, but with two glasses of very old sherry substituted for the more dangerous alcohol.

I am doing duty as Mons. Chabert, the fire-king,—Boston being a perfect oven. I find my pastime and resource in mint julep, imbibed by a macaroni-tube on one side my mouth, whilst I inhale delicious smoke from a real Havannah, stuck in the other. My talented friend the captain has already caricatured me in this happy attitude, making the most of transatlantic pleasures.

Colonel Maxwell, like other English travellers, went to hear the popular preachers,—the great guns of the different cities, who seem prodigious lions in America; and to inspect prisons and lunatic asylums; but he has no decided vocation to this kind of thing, and we, besides, suspect that the British public is about tired of Sing-Sing and the solitary system: one subject he is really great and original upon, though we had fancied it pretty well exhausted; this is the Shakers, of whom he gives some really inviting pictures, though deep shades of extravagance and bigotry are not wanting. He visited the two Shaker establishments on Mount Lebanon, while at the New Lebanon Springs. The season was just closing at this watering-place, and the wane of the fashionable gaieties contrasts well with the gravities of the Shakers:—

I got into a delicious swimming-bath, the constant temperature of which is 72°, as the spring that runs through it never varies throughout the year. Then came a breakfast that would have done honour to merry Scotland: spatch-cock, kippered salmon, omelets, trout, picorelle, (a most delicate fish,) fried potatoes, yellow mush, made from Indian corn, and which you eat with cream; ham, hung-beef, fresh butter, eggs, and honey-comb! After which slight repast, you may indulge in fiddling, bowling, billiarding, or bounding over the mountains like refreshed rebucks.

At dinner, also, you here fare sumptuously; for a more splendid one I never saw put upon a table, and all we lacked was fair partakers of it—for we had come just "a day after the fair." Yesterday was the last of the season, and this morning twenty families had taken flight, leaving very few behind them. It was quite ridiculous to listen to the flowery descriptions of the numerous belles who had graced this place by their presence during the last month, as given by the blackie in attendance; for in this fine, free, enlightened country, it is all nigger work.

"Ah, massa! Miss R. from New York, she d—d fine gal, but she too saucy!" "Oh, yes, massa! Miss L. from Virginia; she very rich, and much too handsome!"

The hall in which we dined is about seventy feet long. The saloon forty feet long by twenty; and here dancing commences each evening, after tea and coffee, at six o'clock. It was this night splendidly illuminated, and the band, a black one, was by no means bad; but, unluckily, it had to perform to empty benches.

After advising the Londoners, and all the other idlers of old England, to take the wings of steam and reach New Lebanon, which he prefers to all the watering-places in Europe, the Colonel describes his visit to the Shaker establishments on the Mount:—

Two great establishments of these most singular beings are on the Mount; the nearest and largest we visited this evening, and were highly delighted with it. The beauty of their gardens, the neatness and cleanliness of their dwellings, the high cultivation of their grounds, struck us much; as did also their workshops, for they are completely independent of the surrounding world, making for themselves everything they require. Both male and female, old and young, have some occupation; and idleness, "the mother of mischief," is banished from amongst them!

We first entered their store, where we purchased toys, cordials, &c. Amongst other things, I recommend their blackberry wine, which cures dysentery. They prepare excellent rose-water and Eau de Cologne,—the process they explained to us. Mr. Hawkins, their trustee and manager, is an active and intelligent person; he is extremely civil to strangers, and affords them every information. He first sent us round under the guidance of a fine, well-informed old girl, Annie Denny, the dairy-maid; and I assure you Annie's dairy was the scene of arrangement and cleanliness, and her cheese-room she exhibited with great exultation. This end of the village had forty cows appertaining to it, under Annie's immediate orders; the other end had an equal number.

We saw shoe-making, saddle-making, and various other employments. My friend walked off, and I was left alone with Annie, who informed me she had been fifty years a Shaker; that her parents had brought her there when she was only five years old, at the time that the society was first formed

That the men and women slept in the same houses, and that they eat their meals at the same tables and at the same time, when there was room; and, in short, that they lived together like brothers and sisters; that they were great readers, and that they had schools for their children, each of which had a separate teacher; and that there was an overseer of the whole! She added, that there was no constraint used, and that people might leave the establishment if they liked; and that there had been no instance of expulsion during the last twenty years.

Having in my mind's eye the young couple I had seen at Endfield, I ventured to ask a few questions as to the course adopted when a tender passion sprang up between two young persons; taking care to frame my interrogatories as delicately as possible, that I might spare the maiden blushes of the interesting Agnes.

She replied, "That might happen sometimes: when it did, they let them quietly take themselves off!"

Taking leave of old Annie, I returned to the toy-shop and was shown into an inner room; where I found my friend, the captain, who is well-read in Holy Writ, in deep and eager disputation with one of the brethren named John Mantle, a man of considerable talent, who seemed to have the whole of the Bible at his finger ends; and who gave chapter and verse for all he advanced with such adroitness, shrewdness, and good sense, that he appeared to me rather to floor his opponent.

The subject when I entered was, as might be expected, the expediency of marriage; when John Mantle said, "The Catholic priesthood have cleverly got rid of the charge brought against them by the Protestants of 'forbidding to marry,' because it is allowed commonly, and included amongst the Seven Sacraments. The Protestants on the other hand, call it a bastard sacrament, and yet uphold it as a Divine institution; and with this view they often talk of solemnising marriages."

The continued theological discussion is no doubt highly edifying, but we pass to matter more mundane—the personal history of John Mantle. How many strange personal histories are bound up with American citizenship!—

"I was born," he said, "where my father and grandfather had been born before me, in a small, neat, comfortable farm-house, near Melton Mowbray, in Leicestershire, where the hounds used often to meet, and where many a good run I have seen when a boy. I came to New York about two-and-thirty years ago. Previous to quitting England I had married, and my wife accompanied me to this country. I am a cooper by trade, and whilst working in my calling I read in a New York paper a description of this society, which attracted my notice. I then travelled to this place with my wife and two children, a boy and a girl; the boy was four years old, the girl only four months. And here my wife and myself were admitted as probationary inmates."

"Our trial lasted four years, Mrs. Mantle and myself and our children all living in the same house, but from the day of our entry we had separate beds." He added, "that the spirit and inclination had moved them both simultaneously, for they had lived apart for upwards of thirty years, although they continued to love each other with pure and unadulterated affection, being the greatest friends, and meeting daily, although now living in separate houses; that their son and daughter, when they grew up, had joined the society, and were at present with them: they were both extremely happy, and had never expressed a wish to quit it; that he brought in property, which was reserved for his children until they were of age to judge for themselves, which they had long been, and when the young people voluntarily joined the brotherhood it was placed in the common stock."

He was a good-looking man, about sixty years of age. He made me write my name in a book, and complimented me by saying it was familiar to him. We became very great friends. He entered into farther explanations as to their habits and pursuits, and gave me his tenets in the following brief words:—

"Lead a life of innocence and purity—love your neighbour as yourself—follow peace with all men, and abstain from war and bloodshed, and from all acts of violence towards your fellow men, as well as from all pursuits of pride and worldly ambition. Render every man his due, and observe 'holiness, without which no man can see the Lord,' and do good to all men as far as opportunity and ability may serve." Thus said John Mantle; and I say, so far so good.

He also informed me that all persons joining their society do so freely and voluntarily—no flattery or undue influence is used; that they have many English and Irish amongst them; the latter they do not like so much as the former, as they find it difficult to bring them to quiet habits of industry; that minute inquiries are made about character and disposition before admission, and that no one is received who has any worldly debts. That industry, temperance, and frugality, are the characteristics of their institution, and that when in health, all must be employed in some useful way for the benefit of the community. From all that I have written about this extraordinary sect, you will perceive that these innocent and industrious people have made a great impression on me. How superior are they to idle nuns and dissolute monks, who, like them, are doomed to celibacy, and war as it were against nature! I admit that nothing can be more ridiculous than their prancing instead of praying (but do not Roman Catholics pass at least half their Sundays in dancing!)—their making Anne Lee, a female Christ—and their wanting to depopulate their own young and rising country on principles which they thus poetically defend:—

"Our flesh and sense must be denied,
Passion and envy, lust and pride;
While justice, temperance, truth, and love,
Our inward piety approve."

We bought a great many knick-knacks, and took an affectionate leave of Mr. Hawkins and John Mantle. About six hundred of these people are congregated together at this place. How different they appeared from those at Endfield, who were rude, rough, and repulsive! these were kind and friendly, and their motto is—

"O magna vis veritatis!"

Our drive home was delightful amidst the fragrant shrubs and balmy breezes of Lebanon. To-morrow we propose going to another settlement of the Shakers, at the hill of Hancock. Anne Lee must have had a tolerable notion of country comfort and picturesque locations.

Notwithstanding his disposition to be contented with everything, and delighted with many things, Colonel Maxwell could not reconcile himself to the bolting system, patronised by man, woman, and child, at breakfast, dinner, lunch, tea, and supper. Five abundant meals a-day, are eaten at the overgrown public places of entertainment; and no time seems allowed to masticate or properly digest one; and though more leisure were allowed, it would not be thus used. Even—

That most important meal of all,—that meal at which aldermen "tremble while they gaze,"—is not the only one which in America is hurried over, and hurried over with most inhuman haste. All manner of good things are set before you, but no time for reflection or selection is afforded you. Promptitude of decision is your only chance: no hanging fire permitted—decks cleared—dessert produced, consisting of peaches, pears, apples, almonds, iced creams, &c.; but, alas! the same system is continued,—gobble, gulp, and go, is still the order of the day.

He considers the bolting system bad alike for health and manners:—

I am now, in some degree, become accustomed to it; but still it is extremely provoking when you happen to be placed by the side of an agreeable person,—and all the American ladies are so,—and when you have just led her into conversation, suddenly she and all the rest of the fair creatures start off like startled deer; or, to speak in more homely phrase, as if the house was on fire!

I have said that all the American ladies are agreeable, and I'll maintain it; and well-bred, too, although certainly I was a little startled this evening at the tea-table, when a black-eyed, intelligent-looking lass, from Philadelphia, who was describing Saratoga Springs, informed me that "all the young dandies there were considerable humbugs, she guessed!" But she was very pretty and very young, and that made up for everything.

Appropos to Springfield, the Birmingham of the Eastern States, where there is an armoury with 91,000 stand of arms, all in excellent order, ready to furnish the citizens with weapons, Colonel Maxwell makes some good-humoured observations, worthy the attention of those British financiers who are all for economy, save in every department in which economy properly might be, and ought to be, enforced.

On leaving Boston, the traveller proceeded by the ordinary route to Albany, New Lebanon, and Troy, where we have already seen him; and afterwards to the celebrated Saratoga Springs. From thence he went to Utica and Ballaston Springs, and afterwards to the falls on the Mohawk river, and to Trenton Falls, and, finally, to Niagara, from which he made several excursions among the broken Indian tribes still loitering in that district. At Buffalo, on his return, he was introduced to Colonel Bankhead, a gentleman from whose conversation we glean more crumbs of comfort as to the maintenance of tranquillity on the Canadian frontier:—

His beautiful and engaging daughter, with the whitest and smallest hand I ever beheld—a Georgian brunette—rendered this agreeable evening still more delightful by her presence; and good-humouredly permitted her honoured sire and myself to smoke cigars and suck mint juleps; whilst I listened to his manly and honourable opinions about Sir George Arthur, the acts of his own government, and the manner he had endeavoured to deal with the wretches whom he had detected trying to involve the two countries in war. I was greatly pleased to find that his opinions were an echo of what General Scott had so repeatedly and emphatically stated to me.

Colonel Bankhead, who commands under the General, gave me most ample proof of the correctness of everything he advanced: and of this I am firmly convinced, that so long as the military command is in the hands of men as honourable as the two I have named, we have nothing to apprehend from the ruffians and wretches who, whilst they call themselves Patriots and Sympathizers, are labouring only to stir up the evil passions of their deluded followers.

In ordinary times we should not care much about the effective army of the Republic, but just now it excites some curiosity; there is, besides, much to commend in the internal economy of the American army. At Buffalo, Colonel Maxwell witnessed the companies of artillery and infantry lying there, paraded, or we may say reviewed, by Colonel Bankhead. He makes some military criticisms on their style of movement, words of command, and so forth, which to plain civilians are of minor importance compared with what follows:—

When they were dismissed, we accompanied the colonel round the barracks. Everything appeared clean, comfortable, and admirably arranged. Each company has a store-room, which is also the quarters of their colour-sergeant, and where every kind of necessary is kept. They dine in their mess-kitchens, which are clean, large, warm, well-ventilated rooms. We tasted their soup, bread, and meat; each excellent of its kind. Their pay, clothing, and food, are all on the most liberal principle. Many of the companies had well-chosen libraries; and there was a sutler's store, where a soda fountain and other harmless luxuries are kept for the men, and where each man has the liberty of having a credit account to a certain extent, which is paid by the paymaster monthly: but this only under the proviso, that the officer in command of the company to which he belongs has no charge against him for extra clothing or repair of arms, &c.

One dollar per month is stopped from each private's pay for the first two or three years of his service: this operates as a great check on desertion. The accumulated sum is handed over to them when they obtain their discharge, even if they do not complete the prescribed period of service, which is five years.

The United States regular army consists of two regiments of dragoons, four of artillery, and eight of infantry, making a grand total of 735 commissioned officers and 11,800 non-commissioned officers and privates. With this force they have to garrison sixty-four military posts and arsenals!—that is to say,—in the eastern division, which extends over the immense tract of country I have already mentioned, there are thirty-seven forts or castles, and three barracks or establishments not fortified; and in the western district, one range of barracks, nine forts, and fourteen arsenals! The eastern division is General Scott's command; and he has his head-quarters at Elizabeth Town.

You will say this is a somewhat small force for so respectable a slice of the habitable world as the United States. True! but then you must be pleased to add a few militiamen to the number, viz. sixty-seven thousand commissioned officers and one million three hundred and twenty thousand seven hundred and thirty-three non-commissioned officers and privates!! Union is strength, and this is strength with a vengeance!—twenty-six states and three territories, as they call them—but will it last! Free states and slave states, will they continue to pull together! I say, No! the Union is unnatural, and cannot last.

Time will show.

The traveller returned to Albany, diversifying the route, and descended the Hudson, by steam, to New York, where we have previously seen him engaged in public celebrations and making speeches. We may, therefore, now have a peep behind the curtain, and the nearest approach which our gallant traveller makes to the perpetration of a few harmless, or perhaps useful Trollopes:—

"A fine, business-like place, this New York!" said I to myself this morning, when, after eating a beautiful breakfast at a beautiful table, with groups of beautiful women around it, I set out upon a voyage of discovery. But I must expatiate a little on our in-door affairs before I take you out to walk with me.

The exquisite delicacy and refinement of the feminine battalion of servants at this hôtel, which is the greatest of the great, is quite delightful and refreshing to the moral feelings. The Astor House phalanx of chambermaids will condescend to make your bed and clean your room, during the time you are at breakfast; but neither love, nor money, nor compassion either, will persuade one of these American Dianas to enter your apartment at a later period of the day.

This morning I requested one, whom I met in passing along the immense galleries in which are the dormitories, to fetch me a jug of water. She looked aghast at the request; but soon, with a smile of compassion at my ignorance, said she would tell one of the waiters to bring it. Soon after I accosted another, and, as it was very hot, requested her to remove the counterpane from my bed. She said it was morally impossible; that it would be as good as her place was worth; but that a waiter should come and do it.

I was vastly amused with this refinement of delicacy in a class which, in other quarters of the globe, is not always characterized by an excess of it; and, to investigate the subject still further, I attacked a third young lady, whom I encountered; and asked her if she would do me the favour to sew a button on the collar of a shirt which I proffered to her. She started back from the dilapidated vestment, dangled her two hands from her wrists, looked aghast, and, uttering that universal word of American astonishment, "Lawk!" turned away, and told me she would send a man for "the thing."

In short, I soon found out that for a single gentleman to expect that a single chambermaid—and there are no double ones—would answer his bell, was an indecorum of the most atrocious sort.

As to the waiters, they are a little army in themselves; and indeed the government of the Astor House establishment is essentially military in all its subdivisions. You are summoned to dinner by peal of bell or stroke of gong—the latter a most ear-appalling sound; you march along in single file, halt, half-face inwards, and take up your assigned position. The field-officers of the day, id est, the head waiters, one at the end of each of the two enormously long tables, stand firm, fixed, and consequential; they move one pace to the front, and wave their right arm high in the air, in the most decisive and fugleman-like style; upon which all the subordinate helps, who are marshalled at equal distances, and have their eyes steadily fixed upon their commanding officers, likewise step one pace to the front! Profound silence reigns around! There is an awful but brief pause of suspense, and the field-officers again wave their napkins aloft; another pace in advance is made by the entire force—the covers are uplifted, the viands displayed, and then the eager tumult of helping and being helped, and the din of knives and forks, and dishes and plates, reverberates from the lofty ceiling.

Carried away by my admiration of this noble display of gastro-military precision and discipline, I have passed over in silence the less striking commencement of the dinner, when the soup is served out; but were I to pass over in silence the soup itself, I should be a traitor to all the better feelings of gratitude, respect, and veneration, which should throb in the heart of every human being who has been so fortunate as to taste it.

CLAM SOUP! a thrill of admiration shakes my pen as it traces the short, the unobtrusive, the humble-looking words, CLAM SOUP! My dear friend, one single table-spoonful of it is a payment in full for all the trouble of a voyage across the Atlantic; one basin full of it would recompense a man for circumnavigating the entire globe! They say it is made of some sort of shell-fish, some mussel which is in abundance here. I don't believe it! It must be something sent down direct from the skies, to bless and support the American ladies: and oh, my dear fellow! to see, as I did to-day, thirty or forty of the dear, fair-haired, gentle-eyed, and pale-cheeked angels, looking so excessively lovely, and eating Clam soup so excessively fast—such heaven-born soup! such celestial feeders!—it is a sight, indeed! But I feel that I dare not trust myself on either of the two subjects, still less on the subjects combined. Come and behold! come and eat!

I have already touched on the domestic manoeuvres exhibited by the aids and helps appertaining to this large and most martially arranged establishment. To-day I had the curiosity to inquire their number, and I have received a list—one hundred and three males and sixty-five females are employed! Mr. Stetson, the director and drillier of them, has promised that I shall be admitted—although against rule—at one of their field-days. They parade for exercise daily at 2 P.M., and are drilled as regularly as I drill my regiment. Why, in some of the small states in Italy, so formidable a display would be a cause of alarm to the government, and, most likely, the legislature would command the house to be shut up for fear of the consequences.

Did the Colonel, by this Clam soup, wish to over-trump the canvass-back ducks of the two Captains? Fortunately this delicacy is open to the experiments of the humblest gourmand; as it is easy, on our own shores, to get a few pence-worth of clams, and impossible to catch a single canvass-back duck.

At Astor House, Colonel Maxwell and his friends preferred eating at the ladies' table, which at dinner is first served; though the ladies come second at breakfast, which in America is taken at a very early hour. There is, however, only one half-hour between the time when the ladies and the men dine; no great space of time in which to clear away debris and serve another great dinner, with all its proper accessories and appointments, to two hundred gentlemen. Here occur sundry really overpowering Trollopes:—

In consequence of getting to our hôtel late, we dined at the gentlemen's table; the ladies' dinner hour being three, the gentlemen's half-past; and I was struck with the change. It was like a pack of hounds without their whippers, &c. Woman, lovely woman! whether ye feed fast or slow, ye are still our better angels, and keep us tranquil and well-behaved! The masculine masticating party amounted to nearly two hundred; and conventional forms were a good deal set at defiance. I found none of the water-drinking system I had so much admired in the provincial towns.

The rattling of knives and forks, the changing of plates, the loud political gabble which was going on universally when the well-filled mouths rendered utterance possible, combined with the numerous discharges of champagne corks, gave the scene the appearance of a well-contested battle-field. This over, an admirable dessert was produced, and cigars were whiffed, to assist digestion: groups were formed, coffee handed round, and politics renewed. There was to-day no bolting after dinner, whatever there might have been at it; and for once "il Signor Stomaco" was allowed to have fair play.

I can only account for this departure from the usual system, by supposing that the guests at the Astor House are at this particular period congregated for political purposes, and, consequently, that they consider that sitting still after dinner is as advantageous a mode of traffic in this commodity as walking up and down the passages and corridors of this huge barrack, which they have been doing all the rest of the day.

This afternoon my two friends, who are much more fastidious than I am, pointed out to me puddles of saliva, as they had often done before. "Well, I admit it," said I; "but I did not come here to pick holes in other people's jackets. Let us put our own house in order before we meddle with our neighbour's." There was a good laugh when I seriously added, that I pitied more than I blamed them. My first impression was, that the whole population of America was under a course of mercury for an universal liver complaint, brought on from bolting their food, and that—poor fellows!—they were all in a state of salivation!

The thing is horrid, there is no denying it: I positively have seen ladies go round to avoid lakes of saliva, or with their dainty feet, step across them, assisted by a gentleman in the same way as he would have assisted a fair friend over a dirty gutter in the street!

Clerical dandyism seems to have an aspect of its own in America. Some of the preachers appear to dress themselves after portraits of the old puritans, or early reformers. After a petit souper in New York, that "would have done no discredit to a fashionable party in London, and where excellent viands were washed down with iced champagne," we are told:—

General Miller, Major B——, and myself walked home with the Rev. Mr. H—— and his family: he is a celebrated preacher, but I must say I did not admire the cut of his jib; his locks were plastered down in form puritanical, and to his chin was attached a large tuft of hair; but these are trifles light as hair, or air, which you will; and though I was a little out of temper with the hair-dressing system of Dr. Wainwright's reverend friend, the doctor himself and all his family are most delightful people."

"In man and woman, but far most in man,
And most of all in man that ministers,
From my soul I loathe all affectation."

The affectations of America are as peculiar as its phraseology, and twenty times more absurd. The latter savours of fun, the former of idiocy.

Colonel Maxwell is not altogether insensible to the little faults of Jonathan, as a dealer and lover of dollars. At Washington he was plucked in handsome style by the shopkeepers; and we are inclined to think that a native would not so quietly have submitted to such extortion or imposition in trifles:—

Let me indulge in a few groans as to the exorbitant charges that are inflicted upon you. The hackney-coachmen are a race of extortioners. A ride to the Capitol is fifty cents.; to Mr. Fox's another fifty. They have no idea of anything under half a dollar; whilst a London cabman, honest man! will take you half over London for the sum. Ask for a bottle of humble port, "Two dollars;" a bottle of sour vin ordinaire of France, which would be dear at three sous, "One dollar." I entered a shop at New York, and bought the smallest possible bottle of lavender-water, "One dollar, if you please;" at Baltimore, for a pair of gloves, "One dollar, if you please." It really becomes perfectly doloureux.

The Americans generally dress very well, and are always to be seen in their best attire. With them, according to the old song,

The Sunday's jacket goes every day on.

Here, as amongst ourselves and everywhere else, there is to be found a sprinkling of absurdity—over-dressed ladies, and barbarously-bearded dandies; and every now and then you meet a nondescript with its hair in ringlets, or, as I saw Murat in bygone days, en papillote.

Colonel Maxwell thinks better of Mr. Van Buren than is usual with English travellers. He first saw the President in a church, singularly devoid of ornament, and with many coloured faces in it:—

Some time after the service had commenced, I observed a well-dressed, middle-aged, gentlemanlike-looking person, attended by a very young man, enter the church, and take his seat in one of the back pews, which had nothing whatever to distinguish it from the rest. Before I overheard Mr. Pouncett whisper to Major B——, "That's the President," I had settled in my own mind that it was so, and that we were in the awful presence of the head of the great Transatlantic Republic, the President of the United States!

I liked the cut of his head, I liked the cut of his whiskers, I liked the cut of his coat,—in short I liked the whole appearance of the man; and, notwithstanding the humble place of worship, his quiet and unostentatious manner, the absence of all ceremonial at his entrance, and the back seat which he occupied, there was something in his air and bearing that well suited the nobility of his position, and there was no mistaking "little Martin Van Buren!"

Service being over, we walked up to his splendid mansion, which commands a noble view of the Potomac. I occasionally gave a glance towards the rear, and beheld the republican monarch walking behind us among the rest of the parishioners. The War Secretary, when we entered the grounds, proposed that we should proceed across the front of the building and enter by the opposite gate, in order to give Mr. Van Buren a few minutes' law before we attacked him; but several gentlemen, who like ourselves were anxious for an interview, had preceded us, and when we entered the presence-chamber we found the President already holding his leek.

We were presented, in due form, and were received with a most cordial shake of the hand, and requested in a frank and unconstrained manner, to take seats. The conversation was of a general nature, and related to the great improvements that had taken place in the Union within these few years. He talked on this subject with somewhat of a tone of exultation, but not too strongly marked; and when Major B——, who has travelled over the States before, acknowledged the great improvements that had taken place, it appeared to give much satisfaction to the patriotic ruler. His manner was easy and gentlemanlike, and the visit was a very agreeable one.

After all the vicissitudes the nineteenth century has witnessed, the following little scene is not without its pathos as well as its lesson. It occurred on board a steamer going from the South to Philadelphia:—

Amongst my shipmates, I observed a tall man, of a dark and sallow complexion, and with a countenance decidedly Italian: he had a bundle in his hand, and was pointed out to me as Prince Achille, the son of Josquin Murat, ex-king of Naples! I absolutely started when I was told this; for I well remembered him in former days, when I had the honour of assisting at a grand review of Murat's army on the Champ de Mars at Naples in 1814. He was then a fine, dashing, well-mounted stripling; and I recollect his riding up to me to express his regret, "that his own regiment of Black Horse was not on the field, but quartered at Capua, as he would have been proud to have charged at their head in my presence."

How like an exaggerated and overcharged romance does everything connected with Napoleon's crowd of kings now appear! Murat was the only one of the set whom my fate brought me into contact with. Poor Murat! he was the bravest of the brave,—"Le sultan of the French armies,"—the best cavalry general in Europe. Owing to my intimacy with Lord W. Buxton and the beautiful Lady O——, your humble servant was at that time brought upon the stage, and made to take a part in the political drama which Murat was then enacting, to save his kingdom and his life; and now his son is his own luggage-bearer!

Sic transit gloria mundi!

But to proceed with our route.

In the route we find nothing particularly worthy of commemoration, save a stylish dinner, and first-rate American establishment, in the vicinity of Philadelphia,—that of Mr. Cadwallader:—

We drove to his mansion, where a party was assembled to meet us, and where our reception was most kind. If his splendid residence, well-appointed household, elegant dinner arrangements, admirably cooked viands, and choice wines may be taken as a sample of the internal economy of an American private gentleman's establishment, I can only say that the New World is not a jot behind the Old. Fifty years' old Madeira, which was absolute nectar—old East India Sherry—Champagne, Mousseaux and still-sparkling Hock and Hermitage—with delicious Châteaux Margaux, were on the table from the commencement of the feast, and within the reach of all the guests, and not paraded round the table at half-hour time, as you and I have sometimes seen it in very pompous places. The first course was excellent; the second super-excellent, consisting of pheasants, quail, partridges, rail, and teal, dressed in a variety of ways, and followed by soufflés, and all sorts of correct things. The whole was wound up by a profusion of ices of various kinds. The cloth removed, still older and still more nectar-like Madeira was produced; but the real business of the evening was transacted in glorious Châteaux Margaux, twenty years old.

The exploits of horses were one of the principal topics of conversation. Mr. Cadwallader is the fortunate possessor of two of the fastest trotters in the world. They can do five-and-twenty in the hour, and are part of a team of four which he has trotted twenty miles an hour. The portraits of the two wonders were produced.

When the fair hostess retired, coffee and cigars were introduced; and, at my request, at a very late hour of the evening, we all paid a visit to the stud, which our early arrangements for to-morrow's journey would otherwise have prevented our seeing.

The stables were very promptly illuminated to receive us at this unusual hour; and the good points and special merits of each of the noble animals were pointed out to us in the most scientific manner. The two best trotters, which had won several cups and matches, were in loose boxes. From the tenor of the conversation, it was evident that the Americans sport their coin freely on the turf; and a bet of 20,000 dollars, which two of the gentlemen present made on a race which was soon to come off, appeared to attract little notice. The stud-groom, as well as several of the under-grooms, were English.

It was close upon the morning when we bade adieu to our kind host and his convivial party; both of us greatly delighted with American cheer and American hospitality. If this is to be taken as a specimen of first-rate Transatlantic spreads, then long life to the Spread Eagle, surrounded by its stars, of which we pronounce Mr. Cadwallader to be one of the first magnitude!

We must conclude these random notices; and have only space to herald a new philosopher who seems to be distancing the phrenologists in America, and who threatens an attack on Britain:—

The political promenade in the passage of the Astor House was not neglected. There I met old friends, and was introduced to new: amongst others, to a phrenological lecturer, who gave me a learned exposition of a new science discovered by himself, which embraces the formation of the body as well as the construction of the head, and which takes in the structure and muscular motions of all the component parts of the human frame. This personage proposes soon to visit England, to enlighten and lighten John Bull, and probably to put his bump of credulity to the test.

A Mr. Colt called upon me. He is the inventor and manufacturer of a rifle that receives eight charges, and fires them with great facility in quick succession. This invention is also applied to pistols and fowling-pieces. I visited his manufactory, and minutely inspected the arm, which I think is good: he has already received a considerable order from the American government.

Other ingenious and useful inventions are mentioned.

Before closing this hasty notice, we must make another effort to allay the terrors of our Tory and Whig friends at the prospect of extended franchises introducing all manner of disorders. At Baltimore there occurred one night a scene of tumult and disorder, which the English travellers fancied threatened a dreadful election riot. Colonel Maxwell tells:—

Before I quitted Baltimore this morning, I made especial inquiries, and glanced over several morning newspapers, supposing it to be totally out of the question that the turbulent crowds collected last night could have separated without performing some of the humours of Donnybrook Fair: but so it was; not a single row—not a solitary broken head, to show up as a proof of the patriotism of the Baltimoreans! It is really quite melancholy; and any genuine Irishman, peasant, squire, or marquis,

Who sleeps on brambles till he kills his man, could never exist in so stupidly peaceful a country.

With the exception of the bowie-knife-flourishing at Niagara, I have never beheld the semblance of a riot. No police, no constables meet the eye; and as for watchmen, Heaven help the young gentleman that has a propensity to floor Charleys,—no such animals exist to be floored!

Our Tory friends will never be able to stand such reports of wild democracy, and these, too, proceeding from a quarter quite above suspicion.

We now take leave of these agreeable volumes, grateful for the entertainment which they have afforded us; and delighted to have this gallant author's assurance of the prevailing temper of the American citizens being strongly inclined to amity and peace with England.

IT'S NAE FUN THAT!*

ANNE CANTIE SANG.

BY THE LATE ROBERT NICOLL.

Ye may laugh brawly i' the noo,
Ye may joke as ye like;
But ye shouldna say the hinnie's gude
Afore ye take the bike.
Love does weel enough to joke about
When comes the gloamin' bat;
But marriage is an awfu' thing:—
It's nae fun that!

We twa are geyan young yet,
We ha'ena meikle gear,
An', if glaikitly we yokit,
We wad aye be toilin' sair;

Maybe poverty wad mak' us
Like our collie and the cat—
An' tearfu' een and scartit lugs—
It's nae fun that!

The men are in a hurry aye—
Will ye gi'e a body time!
And yet, I needna forward look,
I canna see a stime;
To gi'e a body's sel' awa'
For—'od! I kenna what,
It gars a thoughtless lassie think—
It's nae fun that!

An' noo the clud is on your brow,
I shouldna vex you sae;
Yet in my last free maiden hour,
Why mind you what I say!
My first love and my last are you,
My lassie's heart you caught—
O! guess my love by what ye feel—
It's nae fun that!

* It may not be out of place here to state the circumstances under which the above "cantie sang" was written. In a company one evening in Edinburgh, where Mr. Nicoll was present, a young lady was very much rallied on the subject of marriage; till, thinking that the joke was carried a little too far, she put an end to the teasing by exclaiming—"It's nae fun that!"—a phrase which at once caught the humour of the poet, and the song was produced that same night.

CATLIN'S ADVENTURES AMONG THE NORTH AMERICAN INDIANS ON THE UPPER MISSOURI.*

THIS is altogether an unique work. In one view it may be considered as a catalogue raisonnée of the numerous objects of art and curiosity which Mr. Catlin has collected in the course of his wanderings, and arranged in his Indian Gallery; in another, as a narrative of personal adventures, more resembling those of the hardy and enterprising English travellers of the sixteenth and seventeenth century, or of some shipwrecked mariner or captive thrown by evil chance among savage tribes, than as achievements of these degenerate days. There is this essential difference: Mr. Catlin's enterprise was undertaken on the "voluntary principle," from the impulse of buoyant enthusiasm, leading him forth into the vast wilderness of the "Far West," to become the painter and historiographer of the aboriginal tribes, before they are for ever swept into the Pacific by the onward rolling tide of civilisation. He seems one of those men on whom there lies a Fate; and who arise at a particular juncture to fulfil a destined office. Though few years have elapsed since he visited the Indians of the Upper Missouri, already have some of the tribes whose traditions, manners, usages, superstitions, and rude arts he has recorded, been completely swept away, leaving not one Red Man to tell their story. Mr. Catlin was thus just in time, and no more, to gather the trophies and relics of the noble Red race, and to preserve in portraiture the features of its most distinguished chiefs and remarkable individuals.

The memorials of these fast-decaying tribes must ever remain objects of great interest and curiosity to their pale-faced successors,—the usurpers, as Mr. Catlin considers them, of their rights—the fraudulent owners of those interminable forests, and vast prairies, and majestic rivers of which, until so recent a period as the beginning of this century, the Red Man was the sole lord; and which had never been printed with a white man's foot-mark. But these memorials and records are of interest to every civilized people. They distinctly exhibit one phase of the great human Family.

Besides the nearly universal passion for dollar-hunting—to which enthusiasts like Mr. Catlin form slender exceptions—there is in the Anglo-American character a strong propensity to wild and daring adventure, for which, in the present state of society in the United States, it is not difficult to account. In Mr. Catlin this original bias was first displayed by a passion for field-sports; and we need not tell that even in the most highly-cultivated districts of the United States, field-sports are still of a much more manly and stirring character than in the best hunting county in all England, or on its wildest moor. Field-sports there, are indeed but another name for wild and daring adventures by flood and fell. To this original taste, Mr. Catlin came to unite a love of art—untrammelled art—which longed to pursue its objects in wanderings into the wilderness, and among the Red Men, free and uncontrolled, and with no guide save chance. Yet the several stages of his history form a natural and easy chain. He was born in "Fair Wyoming," now a good many years since, while tales and traditions of Indian prowess and Indian manners were still floating over the lovely valley of the Susquehanna. His father was an attorney; and after young Catlin had, as he characteristically tells, whiled away his early years with books reluctantly held in the one hand, and a rifle and fishing-pole most affectionately grasped in the other, he was put regularly to the study of law;—read law books, attended lectures, and became, for a few years, a kind "of Nimrodical lawyer" in his native place. He had, in the meanwhile, dabbled occasionally with a brush; and one fine day he sold his law books, and everything he possessed, save his rifle and fishing-tackle; purchased paints and brushes, and proceeded to Philadelphia to commence portrait painter, without having had a lesson or an adviser. When he had been some years closely engaged in painting the tame "black cloth and blue of civilisation," a band of noble and dignified-looking Indians arrived in the city,—and his vocation was decided as the painter of nations! the Reynolds of the Far West! There was everything stimulating to a young and enthusiastic artist about these swarthy lords of the flood and the forest—

Arrayed and equipped in all their classic beauty,—with shield and helmet,—with tunic and mantles,—tinted and tasseled off, exactly for the painter's palette! In silent and stoic dignity, these lords of the forest strutted about the city for a few days, wrapped in their pictured robes, with their brows plumed with the quills of the war-eagle, attracting the gaze and admiration of all who beheld them. After this, they took their leave for Washington city, and I was left to reflect and regret, which I did long and deeply, until I came to the following deductions and conclusions.

These were that he should abandon everything, in order to preserve, by pictorial illustrations, the history and customs of the grand and fast-decaying race that had thus fired his imagination. He was in that frame of mind when a man of genius is never at a loss for reasons, which at least satisfy himself. His friends, however, when consulted, could not see things in the same light; and he followed his own purpose, without a single sympathizer or abettor. He has, we apprehend, had no reason to repent. He has succeeded in his object, beyond what could have been his most sanguine expectations, and performed a really great achievement. In his Indian gallery, which has excited the admiration and wonder of hundreds of thousands, he has collected not only numerous original and faithful portraits of the most distinguished men and women of most of the surviving aboriginal families of North America, but specimens of their weapons and dresses, and of their arts and manufactures, that are unequalled of their kind; and which must remain, for the instruction of future generations, and a monument of his talents, enthusiasm, and enterprise.

The narrative of Mr. Catlin's personal adventures, during the wandering years in which he was thus engaged, forms a work as unique in literature, as his rare collection of original portraits and curiosities is rare in art. If his ardent admiration of the aboriginal tribes sometimes appears to be carried to excess, it is error on the right side. The glow and vividness of his colouring does not affect the fidelity of his portraiture; and every generous mind must sympathize with his compassionate feelings for the Red Man, and with his resentment at the civilized, christian agents in the demoralisation, and destruction of a noble race.

But the field opened up by Mr. Catlin's rambles is boundless as the prairies which he traversed, and our space is of merely civilized limits; so we must be content with following him in his erratic course by the merest thread, and with often losing sight of him altogether.

Having resolved to start for the "Far West," on the ambitious adventure we have described, it became necessary for Mr. Catlin to inquire where about that same quicksand territory, ever shifting its boundaries, might commence, and where terminate. He says:—

Phantom-like it flies before us as we travel, and on our way it continually glided, before us, as we approach the setting sun.

In the commencement of my Tour, several of my travelling companions from the city of New York, found themselves at a frightful distance to the West, when we arrived at Niagara Falls; and hastened back to amuse their friends with tales and scenes of the West. At Buffalo, a steam-boat was landing with 400 passengers, and twelve days out—"Where from?" "From the West." In the rich state of Ohio, hundreds were selling their farms and going—to the West. In the beautiful city of Cincinnati, people said to me, "Our town has passed the days of its most rapid growth, it is not far enough West." In St. Louis, 1400 miles west of New York, my landlady assured me that I would be pleased with her boarders, for they were nearly all merchants from the "West." I there asked,—"Whence come those steam-boats, laden with pork, honey, hides, &c.?" "From the West."—"Whence those ponderous bars of silver, which those men have been for hours shouldering and putting on board that boat?" "They come from Santa Fé, from the West."—"Where goes this steam-boat so richly laden with dry goods, steam-engines, &c.?" "She goes to Jefferson city."—"Jefferson city, where is that?" "Far to the West."—"And where goes that boat laden down to her gunnels, the Yellow Stone?" "She goes still farther to the West."—"Then," said I, "I'll go to the West." I went on the Yellow Stone—

Two thousand miles on her, and we were at the mouth of Yellow Stone river—at the West. What! invoices, bills of lading, &c., a wholesale establishment so far to the West!—"And those strange-looking, long-haired gentlemen, who have just arrived, and are relating the adventures of their long and tedious journey. Who are they!" "Oh! they are some of our merchants just arrived from the West."—"And that keel-boat, that Mackinaw-boat, and that formidable caravan—all of which are richly laden with goods." "These, sir, are outfits starting for the West."—"Going to the West, ha!" "Then," said I, "I'll try it again. I will try and see if I can go to the West."—"What, a Fort here, too!" "Oui, Monsieur—oui, Monsieur," (as a dauntless, and semibarbarian-looking, jolly fellow, dashed forth in advance of his party on his wild horse to meet me.)—"What distance are you west of Yellow Stone, here, my good fellow?"

A humorous dialogue follows between the Traveller and Ba'tiste, a Frenchman and "free trapper;" and the West flies away and away through many tribes of Indians, until it is lost, but not in the Pacific; for Ba'tiste knew not of its boundaries farther than among the Crows, a handsome, warlike, and chivalrous race of Indians.

In his way to the phantom Far West, Mr. Catlin reached St. Louis; but that place is reckoned at the door, though fifteen hundred miles from the Atlantic cities. From thence, in 1832, he embarked in the first steamer that had ever navigated the Missouri, and after a voyage of three months reached the mouth of the Yellow Stone River, 2000 miles above St. Louis. Here the American Fur Company have a factory and a strong fort, for the protection of their servants while trading with the Indians. The Missouri, up this length, has a singular character; but probably part of its "chocolate colour" might, at this time, have been owing to the spring freshets:—

The Missouri is, perhaps, different in appearance and character from all other rivers in the world; there is a terror in its manner which is sensibly felt, the moment we enter its muddy waters from the Mississippi. From the mouth of the Yellow Stone River, which is the place from whence I am now writing, to its junction with the Mississippi, a distance of 2000 miles, the Missouri, with its boiling, turbid waters, sweeps off, in one unceasing current; and in the whole distance there is scarcely an eddy or resting-place for a canoe. Owing to the continual falling in of its rich alluvial banks, its water is always turbid and opaque; having, at all seasons of the year, the colour of a cup of chocolate or coffee, with sugar and cream stirred into it.

For the distance of 1000 miles above St. Louis, the shores of this river (and, in many places, the whole bed of the stream) are filled with snags and raft, formed of trees of the largest size, which have been undermined by the falling banks and cast into the stream; their roots becoming fastened in the bottom of the river, with their tops floating on the surface of the water, and pointing down the stream, forming the most frightful and discouraging prospect for the adventurous voyageur.

With what propriety this "Hell of waters" might be denominated the "River Styx," I will not undertake to decide; but nothing could be more appropriate or innocent than to call it the River of Sticks.

The scene is not, however, all so dreary; there is a redeeming beauty in the green and carpeted shores, which hem in this huge and terrible deformity of waters.

The next thousand miles of this river navigation is represented as a fairy-land; in passing through which the voyager was riveted to the deck, feasting his eyes on the thousand hills, and bluffs, and dales, and ravines around him, where immense herds of buffaloes, of elks, and antelopes, and "smoking wolves," and mountain-goats, were to be seen bounding up and down and over green fields, carpeted with myriads of shrubs and flowers:—

From St. Louis to the falls of the Missouri, a distance of 2600 miles, is one continued prairie; with the exception of a few of the bottoms formed along the bank of the river, and the streams which are falling into it, which are often covered with the most luxuriant growth of forest timber.

The river scenery among the clay bluffs is of a singular character; and these bluffs, through which the majestic and powerful stream has during endless ages, ploughed for itself a way, hem in much of the long course of the river. "Scarcely," says the traveller, speaking of a bend of the river called the Grand Detour :—

Scarcely anything in nature can be found, I am sure, more exceedingly picturesque than the view from this place; exhibiting the wonderful manner in which the gorges of the river have cut out its deep channel through these walls of clay on either side, of two or three hundred feet in elevation; and the imposing features of the high table-lands in the distance, standing as a perpetual anomaly in the country.

Speaking in another place of these clay bluffs, he says :—

By the continual overflowing of the river, its deposits have been lodged and left with a horizontal surface, spreading the deepest and richest alluvion over the surface of its meadows on either side; through which the river winds its serpentine course, alternately running from one bluff to the other, which present themselves to its shores in all the most picturesque and beautiful shapes and colours imaginable. Some with their green sides gracefully slope down in the most lovely groups to the water's edge; whilst others, divested of their verdure, present themselves in immense masses of clay of different colours, which arrest the eye of the traveller with the most curious views in the world.

These strange and picturesque appearances have been produced by the rains and frosts, which are continually changing the dimensions, and varying the thousand shapes of these denuded hills, by washing down their sides and carrying them into the river.

Amongst these groups may be seen tens and hundreds of thousands of different forms and figures, of the sublime and the picturesque; in many places for miles together, as the boat glides along, there is one continued appearance, before and behind us, of some ancient and boundless city in ruins. Ramparts, terraces, domes, towers, citadels and castles may be seen,—cupolas, and magnificent porticoes, and here and there a solitary column and crumbling pedestal, and even spires of clay which stand alone, and glistening in distance, as the sun's rays are refracted back by the thousand crystals of gypsum which are imbedded in the clay of which they are formed. Over and through these groups of domes and battlements, (as one is compelled to imagine them,) the sun sends his long and gilding rays, at morn or in the evening; giving life and light, by aid of shadows cast to the different glowing colours of these clay-built ruins; shedding a glory over the solitude of this wild and pictured country, which no one can realize unless he travels here and looks upon it.

It is amidst these wild and quiet haunts that the mountain sheep, and the fleet-bounding antelope sport and live in herds, secure from their enemies.

Through two thousand miles of such scenery, they were puffing and blowing for three months—a long period; and yet the voyage was no small achievement. The astonishment and terror of the Indians in the few villages which they passed, may be conceived when the "big thunder canoe," puffing, and blowing, and paddling, and snorting, and firing off the swivels with which she was furnished, approached them :—

We had on board one twelve-pound cannon and three or four eight-pound swivels, which we were taking up to arm the Fur Company's Fort at the mouth of Yellow Stone; and at the approach to every village they were all discharged several times in rapid succession, which threw the inhabitants into utter confusion and amazement. Some of them threw their faces to the ground, and cried to the Great Spirit—some shot their horses and dogs, and sacrificed them to appease the Great Spirit, whom they conceived was offended; some deserted their villages, and ran to the tops of the bluffs some miles distant; and others, in some places, as the boat landed in front of their villages, came with great caution, and peeped over the bank of the river to see the fate of their chiefs; whose duty it was (from the nature of their office) to approach us, whether friends or foes, and to go on board. Sometimes, in this plight, they were instantly thrown neck and heels over each other's heads and shoulders—men, women, and children, and dogs—asaschem, old and young—all in a mass, at the frightful discharge of the steam from the escape-pipe, which the captain of the boat let loose upon them for his own fun and amusement.

There were many curious conjectures amongst the wise men, with regard to the nature and powers of the steam-boat. Amongst the Mandans, some called it the "big thunder canoe;" for, when in distance below the village, they saw the lightning flash from its sides, and heard the thunder come from it; others called it the "big medicine canoe with eyes;" it was medicine (ap-tery) because they could not understand it; and it was have eyes, for, said they, "it sees its own way, and takes the deep water in the middle of the channel."

Mr. Catlin resided for a considerable time in the Fort. It is the largest and best built establishment of the sort on the river, and contains an area of three hundred feet square within walls. It is the head quarters of the Fur Company in this region. Its site is well selected on a beautiful meadow, at the banks of the river, and near the junction of the Yellow Stone River and the Missouri. The Fort is under the care of a countryman of our own :—

Mr. Mackenzie is a kind-hearted and high-minded Scotchman; and seems to have charge of all the Fur Company's business in this region, and from this to the Rocky Mountains. He lives in good and comfortable style, inside of the Fort, which contains some eight or ten log-houses and stores, and has generally forty or fifty men, and one hundred and fifty horses about him.

A great store of the kinds of goods required in the traffic or barter carried on with the Indians is kept here, from which the traders at the outposts are supplied at those seasons when they bring in the fruits of their trade with the natives. The fort was an advantageous post for our adventure, as it was the general rendezvous of all the surrounding tribes, who, in great numbers, encamped around it; in the first place, delivering up their arms, to be kept in the arsenal, until their departure. This precaution was yet more needful to prevent battles between hostile tribes, than for the safety of the whites. Mr. Catlin's brush was immediately at work, in delineating the finest specimens of "the finest-looking, best equipped, and most beautifully-costumed" of any of the Indian tribes; those of the Upper Missouri; including the Crows, the *Assiniboin*s, the Black-feet, and others; of whom he says :—

They live in a country well stocked with buffaloes and wild horses, which furnish them an excellent and easy living; their atmosphere is pure, which produces good health and long life; and they are the most independent and the happiest races of Indians I have met with; they are all entirely in a state of primitive wildness, and consequently are picturesque and handsome, almost beyond description. Nothing in the world, of its kind, can possibly surpass in beauty and grace some of their games and amusements, their gambols and parades.

As far as my travels have yet led me into the Indian country, I have more than realized my former predictions that those Indians who could be found most entirely in a state of nature, with the least knowledge of civilized society, would be found to be the most cleanly in their persons, elegant in their dress and manners, and enjoying life to the greatest perfection. Of such tribes, perhaps the Crows and Blackfeet stand first; and no one would be able to appreciate the richness and elegance (and even taste too) with which some of these people dress, without seeing them in their own country. I will do all I can, however, to make their looks as well as customs known to the world: I will paint with my brush and scribble with my pen, and bring their plumes and plumage, dresses, weapons, &c., and everything but the Indian himself, to prove to the world the assertions which I have made above.

Every one of these red sons of the forest (or rather of the prairie) is a knight and lord—his squaws are his slaves; the only things which he deems worthy of his exertions are to mount his snorting steed, with his bow and quiver slung, his arrow-shield upon his arm, and his long lance glistening in the war-parade; or, divested of all his plumes and trappings, armed with a simple bow and quiver, to plunge his steed amongst the flying herds of buffaloes, and with his sinewy bow, which he seldom bends in vain, to drive deep to life's fountain the whizzing arrow.

This is a specimen of the tone in which the enthusiastic traveller always speaks of the Red Men. In some of those feats in the chase for which they claim distinction, their white neighbours are not by any means their inferiors. A buffalo hunt, in which Mr. Catlin was engaged, gives an animated picture of sport—how different from a tame civilized stag hunt, or humdrum fox hunt!—and a vivid representation of the pioneers, or outlying posts of civilized society:—

I will give a little sketch of a bit of fun I joined in yesterday, with Mr. M'Kenzie and a number of his men, without the company or aid of Indians.

I mentioned the other day, that M'Kenzie's table, from day to day, groans under the weight of buffalo tongues and beavers' tails, and other luxuries of this western land. He has within his Fort a spacious ice-house, in which he preserves his meat fresh for any length of time required; and sometimes, when his larder runs low, he starts out, rallying some five or six of his best hunters, (not to hunt, but to "go for meat.") He leads the party, mounted on his favourite buffalo horse, (i. e. the horse amongst his whole group which is best trained to run the buffalo,) trailing a light and short gun in his hand, such an one as he can most easily reload whilst his horse is at full speed.

Such was the condition of the ice-house yesterday morning, which caused these self-catering gentlemen to cast their eyes with a wishful look over the prairies; and such was the plight in which our host took the lead, and I, and then Mons. Chardon, and Be'tiste Defonde and Tullock, (who is a trader amongst the Crows, and is here at this time, with a large party of that tribe,) and there were several others whose names I do not know.

As we were mounted and ready to start, M'Kenzie called up some four or five of his men, and told them to follow immediately on our trail, with as many one-horse carts, which they were to harness up, to bring home the meat; "ferry them across the river in the scow," said he, "and following our trail through the bottom, you will find us on the plain yonder, between the Yellow Stone and the Missouri rivers, with meat enough to load you home. My watch on yonder bluff has just told us by his signals, that there are cattle a plenty on that spot, and we are going there as fast as possible." We all crossed the river, and galloped away a couple of miles or so, when we mounted the bluff; and to be sure, as was said, there was in full view of us a fine herd of some four or five hundred buffaloes, perfectly at rest, and in their own estimation (probably) perfectly secure. Some were grazing, and others were lying down and sleeping. We advanced within a mile or so of them in full view, and came to a halt. Mons. Chardon "tossed the feather," (a custom always observed, to try the course of the wind,) and we commenced "stripping," as it is termed, (i. e. every man strips himself and his horse of every extraneous and unnecessary appendage of dress, &c., that might be an encumbrance in running:) hats are laid off, and coats, and bullet pouches; sleeves are rolled up, a handkerchief tied tightly around the head, and another around the waist; cartridges are prepared and placed in the waistcoat pocket, or a half-dozen bullets "thrown into the mouth," &c. &c., all of which takes up some ten or fifteen minutes, and is not, in appearance or in effect, unlike a council of war. Our leader lays the whole plan of the chase, and preliminaries all fixed, guns charged and ramrods in our hands, we mount and start for the onset. The horses are all trained for this business, and seem to enter into it with as much enthusiasm, and with as restless a spirit, as the riders themselves. M'Kenzie was foremost in the throng, and soon dashed off amidst the dust and was out of sight—he was after the fattest and the fastest. I had discovered a huge bull whose shoulders towered above the whole band; and I picked my way through the crowd to get alongside of him. I went not for "meat" but for a trophy: I wanted his head and horns. I dashed along through the thundering mass, as they swept away over the plain, scarcely able to tell whether I was on a buffalo's back or my horse—hit, and hooked, and jostled about, till at length I found myself alongside of my game, when I gave him a shot as I passed him. I saw guns flash in several directions about me, but I heard them not. Amidst the trampling throng, Mons. Chardon had wounded a stately bull, and at this moment was passing him again with his piece levelled for another shot; they were both at full speed, and I also, within the reach of the muzzle of my gun, when the bull instantly turned and received the horse upon his horns, and the ground received poor Chardon, who made a frog's leap of some twenty feet or more over the bull's back, and almost under my horse's heels. I wheeled my horse as soon as possible, and rode back, where lay poor Chardon, gasping to start his breath again; and within a few paces of him his huge victim, with his heels high in the air, and the horse lying across him. I dismounted instantly, but Chardon was raising himself on his hands, with his eyes and mouth full of dirt, and feeling for his gun, which lay about thirty feet in advance of him. "Heaven spare you! are you hurt, Chardon?" "Hi—hic—hic—hic—hic—hic—no, no, I believe not. Oh! this is not much, Mons. Cataline—this is nothing new—but this is d—d hard piece of ground here—hic—oh! hic!" At this the poor fellow fainted, but in a few moments arose, picked up his gun, took his horse by the bit; which then opened its eyes, and with a hic and a ugh—UGH! sprang upon its feet—shook off the dirt—and here we were, all upon our legs again, save the bull, whose fate had been more sad than that of either.

The way in which the bull stood for his likeness as the artist rode round him, taking him in all attitudes, and gently goading him, to catch a new expression, can only be known by looking at the noble, shaggy brute, as he stands in ferocious grandeur in the plate. In the space of one mile Mr. Mackenzie had marked out and killed five fat cows; and all of them were killed at full speed; shot through the heart:—

In the short space of time required for a horse under "full whip," to run the distance of one mile, he had discharged his gun five, and loaded it four times—selected his animals, and killed at every shot! There were six or eight others killed at the same time, which altogether furnished, as will be seen, abundance of freight for the carts.

There was talk enough in the Fort over the wine for that evening, we may be sure. Mr. Mackenzie alone was modestly but smilingly silent, while his retainers told of his wonderful exploits.

And now our philosophical and poetical artist began the business which had brought him so far into the wilderness in good earnest. There was no want of subjects for his facile pencil. Wild, incongruous, and constantly shifting groups of Indians of different and hostile tribes; chiefs, sachems, warriors, braves, women and children, horses, and dogs, were at all times assembled round the Fort; and Mr. Catlin niched himself into a bastion with his paint-pots—his easel before him, and his chair, the breech of a twelve-pounder. His singular operations were watched by the Indians with wonder, awe, and in some instances with superstitious horror. But in many cases the sitters were delighted, even when terror mingled with their pride, in seeing themselves live on the canvass. Formidable looking fellows many of them are, as seen in the engravings, particularly when equipped in what Mr. Catlin describes as their beautiful or splendid costumes, decorated with long necklaces, or cordons of bears' claws: strings of scalps, and fringes of scalp-locks attached to the seams of their buffalo and deer-skin dresses. But the portraits of the chiefs must be seen in the work, before the lofty bearing, the dignified and heroic air, the stern and warrior-like countenances, and towering or athletic forms of these wild men can be duly appreciated by those who pride themselves on their high civilisation. Their costumes may be more easily comprehended: though one five minutes spent in the Indian Gallery must be worth volumes of description. When sitting to Mr. Catlin, these bronzed dignitaries, like their civilized white brethren, put on their best looks, and their richest and most becoming garbs. The description of one or two of these will give the reader some idea of Indian costumes. Stu-mick-o-sucks, (the buffalo's back fat,) the head chief of the Black-feet was, it is said, "superbly dressed." We are told in explanation of the plate in which he is represented, that his dress

Consists of a shirt or tunic, made of two deer skins finely dressed, and so placed together with the necks of the skins downwards, and the skins of the hind legs stitched together, the seams running down on each arm, from the neck to the knuckles of the hand; this seam is covered with a band of two inches in width, of very beautiful embroidery of porcupine quills; and suspended from the under edge of this, from the shoulders to the hands, is a fringe of the locks of black hair, which he has taken from the heads of victims slain by his own hand in battle. The leggings are made also of the same material; and down the outer side of the leg, from the hip to the feet, extends also a similar band or belt of the same width; and wrought in the same manner, with porcupine quills, and fringed with scalp-locks. These locks of hair are procured from scalps, and worn as trophies.

The scalp, of which I spoke above, is procured by cutting out a piece of the skin of the head, the size of the palm of the hand or less, containing the very centre or crown of the head, the place where the hair radiates from a point, and exactly over what the phrenologists call self-esteem. This patch then is kept and dried with great care, as proof positive of the death of an enemy, and evidence of a man's claims as a warrior; and after having been formally "danced," as the saying is, (i. e. after it has been stuck up upon a pole or held up by an "old woman," and the warriors have danced around it for two or three weeks at intervals,) it is fastened to the handle of a lance, or the end of a war-club, or divided into a great many small locks, and used to fringe and ornament the victor's dress. When these dresses are seen bearing such trophies, it is of course a difficult matter to purchase them of the Indian, for they often hold them above all price.

In the chief's dress, which I am describing, there are his moccasins, made also of buckskin, and ornamented in a corresponding manner. And over all, his robe, made of the skin of a young buffalo bull, with the hair remaining on; and on the inner or flesh side, beautifully garnished with porcupine quills, and the battles of his life very ingeniously, though rudely, portrayed in pictorial representations. In his hand he holds a very beautiful pipe, the stem of which is four or five feet long, and two inches wide, curiously wound with braids of the porcupine quills of various colours; and the bowl of the pipe ingeniously carved by himself from a piece of red steatite of an interesting character, and which they all tell me is procured somewhere between this place and the Falls of St. Anthony, on the head waters of the Mississippi.

This curious stone has many peculiar qualities, and has, undoubtedly, but one origin in this country, and perhaps in the world. It is found but in the hands of the savage, and every tribe, and nearly every individual in the tribe, has his pipe made of it.

The tunic or shirt of the Mandan men is very similar in shape to that of the Blackfeet—made of two skins of deer or mountain-sheep, strung with scalp-locks, beads, and ermine. The leggings, like those of the other tribes of whom I have spoken, are made of deer skins, and shaped to fit the leg, embroidered with porcupine quills, and fringed with scalps from their enemies' heads. Their moccasins are made of buckskin, and neatly ornamented with porcupine quills—over their shoulders, (or, in other words, over one shoulder and passing under the other,) they very gracefully wear a robe from the young buffalo's back, oftentimes cut down to about half its original size, to make it handy and easy for use. Many of these are also fringed on one side with scalp-locks; and the flesh side of the skin curiously ornamented with pictured representations of the creditable events and battles of their lives.

Their head-dresses are of various sorts, and many of them exceedingly picturesque and handsome; generally made of war-eagles' or ravens' quills and ermine. These are the most costly part of an Indian's dress in all this country, owing to the difficulty of procuring the quills and the fur; the war-eagle being the "rare avis," and the ermine the rarest animal that is found in the country. The tail of a war-eagle in this village, provided it is a perfect one, containing some six or eight quills, which are denominated first-rate plumes, and suitable to arrange in a head-dress, will purchase a tolerable good horse.

In making purchases for his intended gallery, Mr. Catlin was often surprised at the high price demanded for pieces of dress. But, as everywhere else, rarity gave factitious value:—

One of the chiefs, whom I had painted at full length, in a beautiful costume, with head-dress of war-eagles' quills and ermine, extending quite down to his feet, and whom I was soliciting for the purchase of his dress complete, was willing to sell to me all but the head-dress: saying, that "he could not part with that, as he would never be able to get quills and ermine of so good a quality to make another like it." I agreed with him, however, for the rest of the dress, and importuned him, from day to day, for the head-dress, until he at length replied, that, if I must have it, he must have two horses for it; the bargain was instantly struck—the horses were procured of the traders at twenty-five dollars each, and the head-dress secured for my collection.

There is occasionally a chief or a warrior of so extraordinary renown, that he is allowed to wear horns on his head-dress, which give to his aspect a strange and majestic effect. These are made of about a third part of the horn of a buffalo bull; the horn having been split from end to end, and a third part of it taken and shaved thin and light, and highly polished. These are attached to the top of the head-dress on each side, in the same place that they rise and stand on the head of a buffalo; rising out of a mat of ermine skins and tails, which hang over the top of the head-dress, somewhat in the form that the large and profuse locks of hair hang and fall over the head of a buffalo bull.

The Indians attach some mysterious meaning to this strange ornament, which is only allowed to dignitaries of great authority. Mr. Catlin defends the alleged absurdities of Indian costume, by retaliating upon our civilized absurd costumes. The women of the western tribes are all “decently dressed;” and many of them with “great taste and beauty;” their deer and goat-skin habits being often trimmed with ermine, and ornamented with embroidery of porcupine quills. All the women divide the hair on the forehead, and paint the division line with vermilion or red earth. Long hair is a favourite and cherished ornament among the men of the western tribes; though other tribes in the south-west, as the Pawnees, pluck out all the hair save a scalp-lock. The hair is sometimes of the prodigious length of ten feet, and, when in full dress, it is let down, and sweeps the grass, as the warrior-chief moves majestically along.

Though the chiefs and the spectators believed that there was mystery or sorcery in the art of painting likenesses, and that the artist was what we should call a wizard, the dignitaries could not resist the temptation of being what they termed “made alive” by his brush. The way in which they were affected by this marvellous process, throws an incidental light upon the operations of the untutored mind. At the Mandan village, which, as we shall see, he visited after leaving Mr. Mackenzie's Fort, Mr. Catlin relates:—

Perhaps nothing ever more completely astonished these people than the operations of my brush. The art of portrait-painting was a subject entirely new to them, and of course, unthought of; and my appearance here has commenced a new era in the arcana of medicine or mystery. Soon after arriving here, I commenced and finished the portraits of the two principal chiefs. This was done without having awakened the curiosity of the villagers, as they had heard nothing of what was going on, and even the chiefs themselves seemed to be ignorant of my designs, until the pictures were completed. No one else was admitted into my lodge during the operation; and when finished, it was exceedingly amusing to see them mutually recognizing each other's likeness, and assuring each other of the striking resemblance which they bore to the originals. Both of these pressed their hand over their mouths awhile in dead silence, (a custom amongst most tribes, when anything surprises them very much,) looking attentively upon the portraits and myself, and upon the palette and colours with which these unaccountable effects had been produced.

They then walked up to me in the most gentle manner, taking me in turn by the hand, with a firm grip; with head and eyes inclined downwards, and in a tone a little above a whisper—pronounced the words “Te-ho-pe-nee Wash-ee!” and walked off.

Readers, at that moment I was christened with a new NO. XCVI.—VOL. VIII.

and a great name—one by which I am now familiarly hailed, and talked of in this village; and no doubt will be, as long as traditions last in this strange community.

That moment conferred an honour on me, which you as yet do not understand. I took the degree (not of Doctor of Laws, nor Bachelor of Arts) of Master of Arts—of mysteries—of magic, and of hocus pocus. . . .

Te-ho-pe-nee Wash-ee (or medicine white man) is the name I now go by, and it will prove to me, no doubt, of more value than gold, for I have been called upon and feasted by the doctors, who are all mystery-men; and it has been an easy and successful passport already to many strange and mysterious places; and has put me in possession of a vast deal of curious and interesting information, which I am sure I never should have otherwise learned.

After I had finished the portraits of the two chiefs, and they had returned to their wigwams, and deliberately seated themselves by their respective fire-sides, and silently smoked a pipe or two, (according to an universal custom,) they gradually began to tell what had taken place; and at length crowds of gaping listeners, with mouths wide open, thronged their lodges; and a throng of women and girls were about my house, and through every crack and crevice I could see their glistening eyes, which were piercing my hut in a hundred places, from a natural and restless propensity, a curiosity to see what was going on within.

The men at length—the Braves,—pride yielding to curiosity, followed the women, and in crowds. Mr. Kipp, the Fur Company's agent, stationed at the Mandan village, who had lived long among them, and spoke their language fluently, endeavoured with, it would seem, little success, to explain to them how the likenesses were produced:—

The necessity at this time of exposing the portraits to the view of the crowds who were assembled around the house, became imperative, and they were held up together over the door, so that the whole village had a chance to see and recognise their chiefs. The effect upon so mixed a multitude, who as yet had heard no way of accounting for them, was novel and really laughable. The likenesses were instantly recognised, and many of the gaping multitude commenced yelling; some were stamping off in the jarring dance—others were singing, and others again were crying—hundreds covered their mouths with their hands and were mute; others, indignant, drove their spears frightfully into the ground, and some threw a reddened arrow at the sun, and went home to their wigwams.

The pictures seen, the next curiosity was to see the man who made them, and I was called forth. Readers! if you have any imagination, save me the trouble of painting this scene. . . . I stepped forth, and was instantly hemmed in by the throng. Women were gaping and gazing—and warriors and braves were offering me their hands,—whilst little boys and girls, by dozens, were struggling through the crowd to touch me with the ends of their fingers; and whilst I was engaged, from the waist upwards, in fending off the throng and shaking hands, my legs were assailed (not unlike the nibbling of little fish, when I have been standing in deep water) by children, who were creeping between the legs of the bystanders for the curiosity or honour of touching me with the end of their finger. The eager curiosity and expression of astonishment with which they gazed upon me, plainly showed that they looked upon me as some strange and unaccountable being. They pronounced me the greatest medicine-man in the world; for they said I had made living-beings,—they said they could see their chiefs alive, in two places—those that I had made were a little alive—they could see their eyes move—could see them smile and laugh, and that if they could laugh they could certainly speak, if they should try, and they must therefore have some life in them.

The squaws generally agreed, that they had discovered

ed life enough in them to render my medicine too great for the Mandans; saying that such an operation could not be performed without taking away from the original something of his existence, which I put in the picture; and they could see it move, could see it stir.

This curtailing of the natural existence, for the purpose of instilling life into the secondary one, they decided to be an useless and destructive operation, and one which was calculated to do great mischief in their happy community.

In short, a great clamour was raised by the native quacks—the medicine men, whose vocation was in danger, and by the women; and many councils were held. The artist, and his host, Mr. Kipp, were at length able to half convince them that there was no real danger to be apprehended:—

After this, there was no further difficulty about sitting; all were ready to be painted,—the squaws were silent, and my painting-room a continual resort for the chiefs, and braves, and medicine-men; where they waited with impatience for the completion of each one's picture,—that they could decide as to the likeness as it came from under the brush; that they could laugh, and yell, and sing a new song, and smoke a fresh pipe to the health and success of him who had just been safely delivered from the hands and the mystic operation of the "white medicine."

In each of these operations, as they successively took place, I observed that a pipe or two were well filled, and as soon as I commenced painting, the chiefs and braves, who sat around the sides of the lodge, commenced smoking for the success of the picture, (and probably as much or more so for the safe deliverance of the sitter from harm while under the operation,) and so they continued to pass the pipe around until the portrait was completed.

In this way I progressed with my portraits, stopping occasionally very suddenly as if something was wrong, and taking a tremendous puff or two at the pipe, and streaming the smoke through my nostrils, exhibiting in my looks and actions an evident relief; enabling me to proceed with more facility and success,—by flattering and complimenting each one on his good looks after I had got it done, and taking them according to rank or standing, making it a matter of honour with them; which pleased them exceedingly, and gave me and my art the stamp of respectability at once.

I was then taken by the arm by the chiefs, and led to their lodges, where feasts were prepared for me in elegant style, i. e., in the best manner which this country affords; and being led by the arm, and welcomed to them by gentlemen of high and exalted feelings, rendered them in my estimation truly elegant.

There have been three or four instances where proud and aspiring young men have been in my lodge, and after gazing at the portraits of the head chief across the room, (which sits looking them in the eyes,) have raised their hands before their faces and walked around to the side of the lodge, on the right or left, from whence to take a long and fair side-look at the chief, instead of staring him full in the face (which is a most unpardonable offence in all Indian tribes); and after having got in that position, and cast their eyes again upon the portrait which was yet looking them full in the face, have thrown their robes over their heads and bolted out of the wigwam, filled equally with astonishment and indignation; averring, as they always will in a sullen mood, that they "saw the eyes move."—that as they walked around the room "the eyes of the portrait followed them." With these unfortunate gentlemen, repeated efforts have been made by the Traders, and also by the chiefs and doctors, who understand the illusion, to convince them of their error, by explaining the mystery; but they will not hear any explanation whatever; saying, that "what they see with their eyes is always evidence enough for them;" that they always "believe their own eyes sooner than a hundred tongues," and all efforts to get them a second time to my room, or into my company in any place, have proved entirely unsuccessful.

One of the medicine men, who had been the most violent in opposition, and who foretold all manner of evil to the sitters, was mollified when it was proposed to paint himself. He then told the artist, that Although he had been telling the chiefs that they were all fools, and all would die who had their portraits painted—that although he had set the old women and children all crying, and even made some of the young warriors tremble, yet he had no unfriendly feelings towards me, nor any fear or dread of my art." "I know you are a good man, (said he,) I know you will do no harm to any one: your medicine is great, and you are a great 'medicine-man.' I would like to see myself very well—and so would all of the chiefs; but they have all been many days in this medicine-house, and they all know me well, and they have not asked me to come in and be made alies with paints—my friend, I am glad that my people have told you who I am—my heart is glad—I will go to my wigwam and eat, and in a little while I will come, and you may go to work;"—another pipe was lit and smoked, and he got up and went off. I prepared my canvases and palette, and whistled away the time until twelve o'clock, before he made his appearance; having used the whole of the forepart of the day at his toilette, arranging his dress and ornamenting his body for his picture.

At that hour then, bedaubed and streaked with painted various colours, with bear's grease and charcoal, with medicine-pipes in his hands, and foxes' tails attached to his belt, entered Mah-to-he-hah (the old bear) with a train of his own profession, who seated themselves around him; and also a number of boys, whom it was requested should remain with him, and whom I supposed it possible might have been pupils, whom he was instructing in the mysteries of materia medica and koca poca. He took his position in the middle of the room, waving his eagle calumnes in each hand, and singing his medicine-song which he sings over his dying patient, looking me full in the face until I completed his picture, which I painted at full length. His vanity has been completely gratified in the operation; he lies for hours together, day after day, in my room, in front of his picture, gazing intensely upon it: lights my pipe for me while I am painting—shakes hands with me a dozen times on each day, and talks of me, and enlarges upon my medicine virtues and my talents, wherever he goes; so that this new difficulty is now removed, and instead of preaching against me, he is one of my strongest and most enthusiastic friends and aids in the country.

When Mr. Catlin painted women, the chiefs were exceedingly indignant to see that Squaws, their inferiors, their slaves, were admitted to share the same honours with men and chiefs; and he found some difficulty in appeasing their anger. The Exclusives were equally jealous of the vulgar sharing this honour with themselves.

The Crows, a tribe inhabiting the head waters of the Yellow Stone River, were in considerable numbers about the Fort, along with their "natural enemies," the Blackfeet, who are now one of the most numerous and warlike tribes on the continent. They roam about from the spot on which Mr. Catlin saw them, to the Rocky Mountains, occupying the regions about the sources of the Missouri, and amount to fifty thousand. They are warlike, ferocious, and predatory. Under the walls of the Fort, these tribes smoke their pipes together in apparent peace, though, on the turn of a straw, their jealous, fixed, and deadly hate, breaks out. The Crows amount to only seven thousand. They are physically a singularly fine race ; resembling, in this respect, their handsome cousins or namesakes, "the Wild Mac-Craws of Kintail," while, in feats of horsemanship, they even excel their other namesake, Ducrow. We must introduce this noble tribe more particularly to the reader :—

A Crow is known wherever he is met by his beautiful white dress, and his tall and elegant figure ; the greater part of the men being six feet high. The Blackfeet, on the other hand, are more of the Herculean make—about middling stature, with broad shoulders, and great expansion of chest ; and the skins, of which their dresses are made, are chiefly dressed black, or of a dark brown colour ; from which circumstance, in all probability, they having black leggings or moccasins, have got the name of Blackfeet.

The Crows are very handsome and gentlemanly Indians in their personal appearance ; and have been always reputed, since the first acquaintance made with them, very civil and friendly.

These people, to be sure, have in some instances plundered and robbed trappers and travellers in their country ; and for that I have sometimes heard them called rascals and thieves, and rogues of the first order, &c. ; yet they do not consider themselves such ; for thieving in their estimation is a high crime, and considered the most disgraceful act that a man can possibly do. They call this capturing, where they sometimes run off with a Trader's horses and make their boast of it ! considering it a kind of retaliation or summary justice, which they think it right and honourable that they should administer. And why not ! for the unlicensed trespass committed through their country from one end to the other, by mercenary white men, who are destroying the game, and catching all the beaver and other rich and valuable furs out of their country, without paying them an equivalent, or, in fact, anything at all, for it ; and this too, when they have been warned time and again of the danger they would be in, if they longer persisted in the practice. . . .

Mr. McKenzie has repeatedly told me, within the four last weeks, while in conversation relative to the Crows, that they were friendly and honourable in their dealing with the whites, and that he considered them the finest Indians of his acquaintance.

I recollect whilst in St. Louis, and other places at the East, to have heard it often said, that the Crows were a rascally and thieving set of vagabonds, highway robbers.

The Crows are completely vindicated when the other side of the story is told by Mr. Catlin ; yet we imagine that their physique is, as yet, more commendable than their morale—

I have just been painting a number of the Crows, fine looking and noble gentlemen. They are really a handsome and well-formed set of men as can be seen in any part of the world. There is a sort of ease and grace added to their dignity of manners, which gives them the air of gentlemen at once. I observed the other day, that most of them were over six feet high, and very many of these have cultivated their natural hair to such an almost incredible length, that it sweeps the ground as they walk ; there are frequent instances of this kind amongst them, and in some cases, a foot or more of it will drag on the grass as they walk, giving exceeding grace and beauty to their movements. They usually oil their hair with a profusion of bear's grease every morning, which is no doubt one cause of the unusual length to which their hair extends ; though it cannot be the sole cause of it, for the other tribes throughout this country use the bear's grease in equal profusion without producing the same results. The Mandans, however, and the Sioux, of whom I shall speak in future epistles, have cultivated a very great growth of the hair, as many of them are seen whose hair reaches near to the ground.

This extraordinary length of hair amongst the Crows is confined to the men alone ; for the women, though all of them with glossy and beautiful hair, and a great profusion of it, are unable to cultivate it to so great a length ; or else they are not allowed to compete with their lords in a fashion so ornamental, (and on which the men so highly pride themselves,) and are obliged in many cases to cut it short off.

The fashion of long hair amongst the men prevails throughout all the Western and North Western tribes, after passing the Sacs and Foxes ; and the Pawnees of the Platte, who, with two or three other tribes only, are in the habit of shaving nearly the whole head.

The present chief of the Crows, who is called "Long-hair," and has received his name as well as his office from the circumstance of having the longest hair of any man in the nation, I have not yet seen : but I hope I yet may, ere I leave this part of the country. This extraordinary man is known to several gentlemen with whom I am acquainted, and particularly to Messrs. Sublette and Campbell, of whom I have before spoken, who told me they had lived in his hospitable lodge for months together ; and assured me that they had measured his hair by a correct means, and found it to be ten feet and seven inches in length ; closely inspecting every part of it at the same time, and satisfying themselves that it was the natural growth.

It is a common custom amongst most of these upper tribes, to splice or add on several lengths of hair, by fastening them with glue ; probably for the purpose of imitating the Crows, upon whom alone Nature has bestowed this conspicuous and signal ornament.

Amongst the Crows of distinction now at this place, I have painted the portraits of several, who exhibit some striking peculiarities. Amongst whom is Chah-ee-chopes, the four wolves ; a fine looking fellow, six feet in stature, and whose natural hair sweeps the grass as he walks ; he is beautifully clad, and carries himself with the most graceful and manly mien. He is in mourning for a brother ; and according to their custom, has cut off a number of locks of his long hair ; which is as much as a man can well spare of so valued an ornament, which he has been for the greater part of his life cultivating ; whilst a woman who mourns for a husband or child, is obliged to crop her hair short to her head, and so remain till it grows out again ; ceasing gradually to mourn as her hair approaches to its former length.

In describing Pariskaroopa (the two Crows), a young chief, whose portrait he painted, and who is one of the most extraordinary men of the Crow nation, the artist notices a fact worthy of the attention of craniologists. The young man is not only remarkable for his extraordinary sagacity as a counsellor and an orator, but for having no forehead :—

There is something very uncommon in this outline, and sets forth the striking peculiarity of the Crow tribe, though rather in an exaggerated form. The semi-lunar outline of the Crow head, with an exceedingly low and retreating forehead, is certainly a very peculiar and striking characteristic ; and though not so strongly marked in most of the tribe as in the present instance, is sufficient for their detection whenever they are met ; and will be subject for further comment in another place.

In this singular feature, the Crows resemble our Ducrow ; and those antiquaries who hunt up Madoc's Welsh colony, would do well to look for another—a Scott's branch.

The account of the Flat-head Indians given by Mr. Catlin, and other travellers, must also perplex the phrenologists. The mass of the brain, from a fantastic fashion, is, in infancy, squeezed into the most unnatural shape ; but with no apparent effect on the character.

The women of this tribe and of the Blackfeet, and indeed of most other tribes, are not handsome : they are drudges and slaves, like all the Indian women ; eating apart after their lords are served.

and not allowed to join in the religious rites and ceremonies, nor in the dances and festive amusements. Polygamy is common among all the tribes, for which Mr. Catlin assigns what he seems to consider very sufficient reasons; namely, that as a man of distinction can obtain no labourers and slaves, save his squaws, to enrich him, or enable him to maintain his proper dignity, a great many wives are consequently required.

It is no uncommon thing to find a chief with six, eight, or ten, and some with twelve or fourteen wives in his lodge. Such is an ancient custom, and in their estimation is right as well as necessary. Women in a savage state, I believe, are always held in a rank inferior to that of the men, in relation to whom in many respects they stand rather in the light of menials and slaves than otherwise; and as they are the "hewers of wood and drawers of water," it becomes a matter of necessity for a chief (who must be liberal, keep open doors, and entertain, for the support of his popularity) to have in his wigwam a sufficient number of such handmaids or menials to perform the numerous duties and drudgeries of so large and expensive an establishment.

There are two other reasons for this custom which operate with equal, if not with greater force than the one above assigned. In the first place, these people, though far behind the civilized world in acquisitiveness, have still more or less passion for the accumulation of wealth, or, in other words, for the luxuries of life; and a chief, excited by a desire of this kind, together with a wish to be able to furnish his lodge with something more than ordinary for the entertainment of his own people, as well as strangers who fall upon his hospitality, sees fit to marry a number of wives, who are kept at hard labour during most of the year; and the avails of that labour enable him to procure those luxuries, and give to his lodge the appearance of respectability which is not ordinarily seen. Amongst those tribes who trade with the Fur Companies, this system is carried out to a great extent, and the women are kept, for the greater part of the year, dressing buffalo robes and other skins for the market; and the brave or chief, who has the greatest number of wives, is considered the most affluent and envied man in the tribe; for his table is most bountifully supplied, and his lodge the most abundantly furnished with the luxuries of civilized manufacture, who has at the year's end the greatest number of robes to vend to the Fur Company.

The manual labour amongst savages is all done by the women; and as there are no daily labourers or persons who will "hire out" to labour for another, it becomes necessary for him who requires more than the labour or services of one, to add to the number by legalizing and compromising by the ceremony of marriage, his stock of labourers; who can thus, and thus alone, be easily enslaved, and the results of their labour turned to good account.

There is yet the other inducement, which probably is more effective than either; the natural inclination which belongs to man, who stands high in the estimation of his people and wields the sceptre of power—surrounded by temptations which he considers it would be unnatural to resist, where no law or regulation of society stands in the way of his enjoyment. Such a custom amongst savage nations can easily be excused too.

We shall not trouble ourselves with the excuse. It is enough that, to some extent, might makes right all over the world; and that a poor Indian who has not horses nor guns with which to purchase wives from their fathers or brothers, has seldom more than one. The doctors, again,—the cunning medicine men, half rude physicians, half conjurors, and wholly knaves,—generally contrive to obtain a half dozen slaves under the name of wives. The white traders supply themselves in the usual manner of the country, by making a present to the father. They like to form alliances with the influential families, like other great men, from political reasons. When the trader or clerk leaves the country, his squaw returns to her family; and her fortunate father will sometimes obtain a second price for her, either from some native husband or new comer.

The degraded condition of the sex has not extinguished the natural feelings of womanhood among those ill-treated and cheerfully-enduring creatures. Many beautiful traits of their gentleness and affectionate disposition are related by Mr. Catlin, and indeed by all other travellers in those regions. Of the Mandan women, he says:—

They are beautiful and modest,—and amongst the respectable families virtue is as highly cherished and as inapproachable, as in any society whatever: yet at the same time a chief may marry a dozen wives if he pleases, and so may a white man; and if either wishes to marry the most beautiful and modest girl in the tribe, she is valued only equal, perhaps, to two horses, a gun with powder and ball for a year, five or six pounds of beads, a couple of gallons of whisky, and a handful of awls.

The girls of this tribe, like those of most of these north-western tribes, marry at the age of twelve or fourteen, and some at the age of eleven years; and their beauty, from this fact, as well as from the slavish life they lead, soon after marriage vanishes. Their occupations are almost continual, and they seem to go industriously to them, as if from choice or inclination, without a murmur.

While sojourning in another part of the Fur West, among a small tribe called the Pawnee, whose village is a thousand miles from St. Louis, Mr. Catlin relates an amusing incident, which is also illustrative of the marriage-customs of the Indians:—

The chief of this tribe, whose name is Shoo-de-ga-chi, (smoke,) I painted at full length, and his wife also, a young and very pretty woman, whose name is Hee-la-dee (the pure fountain); her neck and arms were curiously tattooed, which is a very frequent mode of ornamenting the body amongst this and some other tribes; which is done by pricking into the skin, gunpowder and vermilion.

The chief, who was wrapped in a buffalo robe, is a noble specimen of native dignity and philosophy. I conversed much with him; and from his dignified manners, as well as from the soundness of his reasoning, I became fully convinced that he deserved to be the sachem of a more numerous and prosperous tribe. He related to me with great coolness and frankness, the poverty and distress of his nation; and, with the method of a philosopher, predicted the certain and rapid extinction of his tribe, which he had not the power to avert. Poor, noble chief; who was equal to, and worthy of a greater empire! He sat upon the deck of the steamer, overlooking the little cluster of his wigwams, mingled amongst the trees; and, like Caius Marius weeping over the ruins of Carthage, shed tears as he was descanting on the poverty of his ill-fated little community, which he told me "had once been powerful and happy; that the buffaloes, which the Great Spirit had given them for food, and which formerly spread all over their green prairies, had all been killed or driven out by the approach of white men, who wanted their skins; that their country was now entirely destitute of game, and even of roots for their food, as it was one continued prairie; and that his young men penetrating the countries of their enemies for buffaloes, which they were obliged to do, were out to pieces and destroyed in great numbers. That his people had foolishly become fond of fire-water, (whisky,) and had given away everything in their country for it—that it had destroyed many of his warriors, and soon would destroy the rest—that his tribe was too small, and his warriors too few to go to war with the tribes around them; that they were met and killed by the Sioux on the north, by the Pawnees on the west, and by the Osages and Konzas on the south; and still more alarmed from the constant advance of the pale faces, their enemies, from the east, with whisky and small-pox, which already had destroyed four-fifths of his tribe, and soon would impoverish and at last destroy the remainder of them.”

In this way did this shrewd philosopher lament over the unlucky destiny of his tribe; and I pitied him with all my heart. I have no doubt of the correctness of his representations; and I believe there is no tribe on the frontier more in want, nor any more deserving of the sympathy and charity of the government and Christian societies of the civilized world.

The son of this chief, a youth of eighteen years, and whose portrait I painted, distinguished himself in a singular manner the day before our steamer reached their village, by taking to him four wives in one day! This extraordinary and unprecedented freak of his, was just the thing to make him the greatest sort of medicine in the eyes of his people; and probably he may date much of his success and greatness through life to this bold and original step, which suddenly raised him into notice and importance.

The old chief, Shoo-de-ga-cha, of whom I have spoken above, considering his son to have arrived to the age of maturity, fitted him out for house-keeping, by giving him a handsome wigwam to live in, and nine horses, with many other valuable presents; when the boy, whose name is Honga-kay-de, (the great chief,) soon laid his plans for the proud and pleasant epoch in his life, and consummated them in the following ingenious and amusing manner:—

Wishing to connect himself with, and consequently to secure the countenance of some of the most influential men in the tribe, he had held an interview with one of the most distinguished; and easily (being the son of a chief) made an arrangement for the hand of his daughter, which he was to receive on a certain day, and at a certain hour, for which he was to give two horses, a gun, and several pounds of tobacco. This was enjoined on the father as a profound secret, and as a condition of the espousal. In like manner, he soon made similar arrangements with three other leading men of the tribe, each of whom had a young and beautiful daughter, of marriageable age. To each of the fathers he had promised two horses, and other presents similar to those stipulated for in the first instance, and all under the same injunctions of secrecy, until the hour approached, when he had announced to the whole tribe that he was to be married. At the time appointed, they all assembled, and all were in ignorance of the fair hand that was to be placed in his on this occasion. He had got some of his young friends who were prepared to assist him, to lead up the eight horses. He took two of them by the halters, and the other presents agreed upon in his other hand, and advancing to the first of the parents, whose daughter was standing by the side of him, saying to him, “you promised me the hand of your daughter on this day, for which I was to give you two horses.” The father assented with a “ugh!” receiving the presents, and giving his child; when some confusion ensued from the simultaneous remonstrances, which were suddenly made by the other three parents, who had brought their daughters forward, and were shocked at this sudden disappointment, as well as by the mutual declarations they were making, of similar contracts that each one had entered into with him! As soon as they could be pacified, and silence was restored, he exultingly replied, “You have all acknowledged in public your promises with me, which I shall expect you to fulfil. I am here to perform all the engagements which I have made, and I expect you all to do the same.” No more was said. He led up the two horses for each, and delivered the other presents; leading off to his wigwam his four brides—taking two in each hand, and commenced at once upon his new mode of life; reserving only one of his horses for his own daily use.

I visited the wigwam of this young installed medicine-man several times, and saw his four modest little wives seated around the fire, where all seemed to harmonize very well; and for aught I could discover, were entering very happily on the duties and pleasures of married life. I selected one of them for her portrait, and painted it. Mong-shong-shaw, (the bending willow), in a very pretty dress of deer-skins, and covered with a young buffalo's robe, which was handsomely ornamented, and worn with much grace and pleasing effect.

Mr. Chouteau of the Fur Company, and Major Sanford, the agent for the Upper Missouri Indians, were with me at this time; and both of these gentlemen, highly pleased with so ingenious and innocent a freak, felt disposed to be liberal, and sent them many presents from the steamer.

The ages of these young brides were probably all between twelve and fifteen years, the season of life in which most of the girls in this wild country contract marriage.

Account of Koonawur, in the Himalaya. By the late Captain Alexander Gerard. Edited by George Lloyd, Esq. Madden and Co.

This volume may be considered a sequel to the Narrative of Major Sir William Lloyd and Captain Gerard, noticed by us some time since.* Captain Gerard, who long suffered from delicate health, originally induced by his ardent pursuit of science, has since died, and from several journals previously communicated to Mr. Lloyd by him, and numerous other note-books, and routes, since forwarded by his relatives, the Account of the Koonawur is compiled. The Narrative is accompanied by a detached map of the country described; and an Appendix contains a number of tables, framed from the scientific observations made at the time. Koonawur, called, likewise, Koorpa, is the tract of country belonging to Busehur, which lies on both banks of the Sutluj, from latitude 31 deg. 15 min. to 32 deg. 4 min., and from longitude 77 deg. 50 min. to 78 deg. 50 min. It runs in a north-east and south-west direction; and the habitable part seldom exceeds eight miles in breadth. It is a secluded region, rugged and mountainous in an extraordinary degree. It is terminated on the north and north-west by mountains covered with perpetual snow, and from 18,000 to 20,000 feet above the level of the sea. These mountains separate it from Ladak, a large extent of country running along the banks of the Indus, from the vicinity of Garoo to the limits of Cashmere. Though the population of this grand and picturesque region is very scanty in proportion to its extent, the account of these Asiatic Highlanders, and of the fertile small valleys and sublime mountain tracts which they inhabit, is full of interest. They are a race still comparatively unknown to Europeans, but worthy of being better known, as will be perceived by the picture here presented of them. In point of civilisation they are much on a par with the tribes of the Himalaya, formerly described by the brothers Gerard, and other travellers. Their agriculture is in nearly the same condition; they have the same breeds of domestic animals; nearly the same wild and cultivated fruits and vegetables, and the same arts and rude manufactures. Of the people themselves, it is said:—

The inhabitants are generally of a dark complexion, but good looking, and some of them have ruddy faces; they are well made and muscular, and their stature is from five feet five inches to five feet nine inches; they are frank, active, generous, hospitable, and highly honourable in their dealings. Thieves and robbers are unknown; and a person's word may be implicitly relied upon, in anything regarding money-matters. They have not the least distrust or suspicion, and I had two remarkable instances of this kind, which is so very opposite to the character of the natives of lower India.

I reached the village of Koono without a single farthing, not even to pay the guides, owing to the money I expected having been sent up to the valley of the Sutluj. An inhabitant of Thungee whom I had only seen once, when he heard of this, advanced me twelve rupees, which he said I might repay when he visited Rampoor in November. I had an opportunity of rewarding this person, for I received a supply of cash next day.

I was exactly in the same predicament when I left Soongnum for Manes; and Putee Ram, the intelligent Koonawuree mentioned by Mr. Fraser, who is better known as Lahourepung, the name of his house, gave me ten rupees, and told me I was welcome to a hundred if I required so much; for this good act I authorized him to open the sealed bag of money that arrived two days afterwards, and take out twenty. Putee Ram said there was no occasion for this, but that he would receive the money at Rampoor in December, either from my brother or me.

The Koonawurees pride themselves upon their country, and well know how superior they are to the other mountaineers. Not long since I asked one of the Rajah's attendants where he staid: he staid, he answered, "In Buree." I replied, "It is in Dusow, I believe!" "No," said he, with seeming scorn, "I know little about the people of that district: I am a Koonawuree, and live in Buree, of Utharabees."

It is only the natives of Koonawur that are trusted with money or any message of importance: most of the officers of court, and nearly all the attendants on the Rajah are from this part of Busehur.

The food of the people is bannocks of different kinds of grain, kitchen vegetables, and a great proportion of meat: their most usual drink is tea, and they occasionally take a dram of spirituous liquor, and at their festivals they indulge pretty freely.

The inhabitants are often extremely dirty, which seems to be natural to those of high mountainous countries; and it is not surprising, for when my brother and I were encamped at 15,000 and 16,000 feet without a tent, for several days in a frigid atmosphere, we frequently did not undress for a week; and when the skin was peeled off our hands and faces, we did not find it agreeable to touch water at the temperature of freezing, for as long a time.

Notwithstanding the want of grain, there are no marks of poverty in the country, and the inhabitants are generally so rich, that when two of them belonging to the village of Leedung wished for an advance of 1000 rupees to purchase wool for the British Government, the Wazeer in charge of that place, said, he would go security for 10,000 rupees each person. This is by no means a singular instance; for although none of them have large fortunes, like the merchants and bankers of the plains, yet the riches are much more equally divided, and the poorest people are never in want; for if even grain be scarce, as it often is, yet their large flocks furnish an inexhaustible store.

The people are as well clad as they can be, and seem to enjoy a much greater degree of comfort than any of the other mountaineers I have seen; their general dress is a frock of white blanket, often twice folded, reaching to the knees, and having sleeves, a pair of trousers and girdle of the same, a cap of black blanket, and shoes, of which the upper part is woollen, and the sole alone leather. Everybody has a steel for striking fire, ornamented with brass, hanging from his right side, and they commonly wear a hatchet stuck in their girdle, above which is tied a rope of goat's hair, neatly plaited and extremely strong, which they use in carrying burdens.

The dress of the women is much the same, and in fact they have a brass clasp called Peehook, in shape like a pair of spectacles, but much larger; they also wear bracelets, ear-rings, and anklets of pewter and silver.

A garment of goat's hair, named Kheear, is sometimes used; it is not so warm as the dress of blanket, but it keeps out rain well.

The Koonawurees are all traders, and their chief riches consist in large flocks of sheep and goats, that furnish them with wool, which, together with raising, they exchange for grain.

They lead a pleasant life. In November many of them come to Rampoor with wool, and a few go to the plains to purchase merchandise for the markets of Garoo and Leh, and they likewise visit the fair at Hurdwar. Most of them go to Leh or Garoo in the summer months, in which countries they travel much at their ease, compared to what they do in Koonawur; none of them carry loads, for the roads are so good that all their merchandise goes upon horses, mules, asses, yaks, goats, and sheep; many ride upon horseback, and often run races on the way; others amuse themselves with the gun, and kill deer and hares, which they eat, and the skins of the former furnish them with leather for their shoes. The people who stay at home, look after their vineyards and attend to their flocks, which, for four or five months, are sent to pasture high up on the mountains. The shepherds are relieved regularly, and during their absence they live in small houses, named Degree, or Shurnung, where they employ themselves in making butter. The situations of many of these *Degree*s are uncommonly romantic, upon the sides of sunny banks, covered with carpets of the most fragrant flowers, or in sequestered dells, surrounded by huge mountains, towering to the skies; some presenting bare faces of granite, or craggy heights, threatening destruction to the peaceful flocks, whilst others are crowned with perpetual snow. The contrast of these with the dark forests of oak, covered with mosses and lichens streaming in the wind, interspersed with the light green foliage of the pine, and topped with yellow-coloured bells of birch and rhododendron in full bloom, form the grandest scenery imaginable. In summer the climate of these delightful spots is charming; and it is here that the raspberry, black currant, and strawberry are found in the highest perfection, upon the verdant banks of the limpid streams, that descend from melted snow. In the cold season, the people occupy their time in weaving blankets, caps, and shoes, which are their only manufactures. They early begin to collect their winter stock of fuel and food for their cattle, which last consists chiefly of the leaves of trees, and they pile it on the tops of their houses.

The people are fond of dancing and singing, and they have several annual festivals, which they celebrate with a degree of joy scarcely known amongst other Asiatic nations. The grandest festival is called Mentiko, which prevails throughout the whole of Koonawur; it is held in the beginning of September, but I could get no account of its origin. All the people who are able to move leave their villages, and ascend the nearest hill; they proceed slowly, making a circuit of several days, and this is a time of the greatest festivity; they adorn themselves with garlands and flowers, and sing and dance to the sound of music, which is much more melodious than the Hindoostanee tunes: they play at all sorts of amusements, run foot and horse races when the ground will admit of it, perform feats of agility, feast, and drink.

Their musical instruments are large and small trumpets, shells for blowing, drums and kettle-drums: these are chiefly used to please the gods; but during their holidays they play upon tambours, flutes, pipes, fiddles, and double flageolets, and many of their airs are very pleasing. They like to ornament themselves with wreaths of flowers, and you seldom see a person without some about his cap. In crossing the high passes, or after we had been encamped for some days on spots without vegetation, our guides seemed to hail with rapture the first flowers they saw; they pulled and stuck them into the rims of their caps, and farther down exchanged them for the rhododendron, or some other sweet-smelling flower.

The population of the Koonawur is estimated at about nine thousand souls. The mass of the people profess the Hindoo religion, and a few the Lama religion. They are subjects or tributaries of the Busehur government, and are lightly taxed. They make brave, hardy, and faithful soldiers. Their villages are large, and their houses spacious and even elegant; substantially built of stone and wood, two stories high, and either slated or flat-roofed, with projecting balconies.

There is a blacksmith and carpenter in each large village; but they are indifferent workmen, and for the construction of the temples, they get people from the lower hills.

The household furniture consists of little more than some keloo chests for keeping grain, raisins, and apricots, a weaving apparatus which is very simple, spindles for twisting worsted, back-baskets, skins for holding flour, butter, and spirituous liquors, brass and iron cooking pots, wooden plates, a stone mortar for expressing oil from the kernel of the apricot, a hand mill, a lamp or two, a smoking-pipe, a teapot, and sometimes a few China cups and saucers. Bedsteads are almost unknown; and the earth is of broken granite, unfit for pottery, so they keep water and oil in vessels of different shapes and sizes, made of juniper wood, with iron hoops, and resembling those called cogs by the Scotch Highlanders.

With these entertaining extracts, we must leave this new chapter of the history of the great human family to the intelligent curiosity of the reader.

The Bard: and Minor Poems. By John Walker Ord. Author of "England," a Poem, &c. Collected and edited by John Lodge.

Within the last ten years, the name of Mr. Ord has been more than whispered in the realms of poetry, and has had its fair share of fame, though not more than was due to it. His compositions are distinguished by fire and vigour, which are but rarely found in alliance with the same degree of tenderness and sweetness that are found in many of his graceful minor poems. "The Bard," by much the longest piece in this collection, was written when the author was a youth of nineteen. It is among the most remarkable of the poetical productions of the teens, and one which gives promise of no ordinary powers. We are not exactly able to say that the young poet's progress has fulfilled this brilliant early promise. Yet he has since produced a great deal of beautiful and vigorous occasional verse. From the collection before us, we would gladly select a few specimens. But one piece, which Professor Wilson pronounces "full of fancy, feeling, and imagination," is rather long for our space; while others are already familiar, from having appeared in Magazines and Annuals; so that our scope of choice is limited. From Guisborough Abbey—a fine descriptive poem—we take this passage:—

Hail, fane august! hail, venerable tower!
Even thus I saw thee in sweet boyhood's hour:
Even so, in majesty thou didst appear
Ere hope was dim, ere sorrow left a tear.
Bright were thy towers and lovely—bright and fair,
When first with dread I clomb each broken stair;
Since then, what fears, what exultations mine!
But thou art still erect and half divine!

Thus hast thou gazed on generations dead,
Thus wilt thou brood along my funeral-bed;
Yea, from thine eyrie, where the owl doth dwell,
Hooting to night its sad and dismal knell,
Thou hast beheld the monumental stone,
The sepulchres of generations gone!
Of manly sires, in woe and silence dead,
Of silver'd matrons, to oblivion wed,
Of youth and beauty mouldering in the tomb,
Of cherub-childhood in its final home;
Hast heard (if ought of consciousness be thine!)
The husband weep, the lover mourn and pine,
And, gray thyself with hoary streaks of time,
View'd genius perish in its proudest prime;
And, like Palmyra weeping o'er its woes,
Felt human pains and agonizing throes!

Tombs of my kindred!—reverential bier
Of her the most beloved, the ever dear;
Sister and friend, and teacher, always good,
Pride of the vale, and grace of womanhood;
Gentle of heart, of pure and lofty mind,
To me, to all, most generous, most kind;
O, snatch'd in bloom of loveliness and youth,
The soul of virtue, cynosure of truth;
Too early taken from this vale of tears,
Too early nipt by Fate's unbidden shears,
Why should I hide the impulse of my heart?
Why chain the lyre, beloved as thou wert?
Thy dying words and blessings were for me,
The Poet's Epitaph I leave to thee:
And 'neath that Abbey's venerable shade,
Beside thy hallow'd bones shall mine be laid!

Every circumstance considered—of youth, rank, and womanhood, the young Queen Victoria has inspired very few of her tuneful subjects. Mr. Ord is an exception, though a rampant Tory. He has written many copies of verses to the Queen, and all of them good, classic, well-sounding, laureate verses. From "Verses to the Princess on attaining her majority," we quote these:—

Heaven's blessings be upon thee,
Fair heiress of the land,
Born to ancestral monarchies
Of splendour and command!
Gigantic nations honour thee,
And kiss thy queenly hand.

Swart India with her millions
Is kneeling at thy feet;
The old monarchic chieftains
Thy rising glory greet;
And each rejoicing British heart
Doth now exultant beat.

The laurels of a thousand years
Are circl'd o'er thy brow;
The victories of all her kings
Are of thy trophies now:
For Cressy fierce, and Agincourt,
Do now resplendent glow.

Each cliff that soars majestic,
Each valley rich and fair,
Each wood that owns thy natal May,
Is proud of England's heir:
All Nature joins in chorus sweet,
Delighting 'neath thy care.

Sustain the ancient altar,
Religion's surest good;
Sustain the aristocracy
From anarchy and blood;
And, oh, let Freedom firmly stand
Where it hath ever stood!

Then will thy kingdom bless thee,
And millions cheer thy name;
The fertile vales will paint thy praise,
Thy triumph, power, and fame;
And History's pages consecrate
Thy reign in words of fame.

All Hope and Truth attend thee,
 Britannia's dearest gem :
 Let all unite in common pride,
 To glorify her name :
 And may the God of heaven protect
 Her crown and diadem !

The next poem, written on the occasion of the young Queen's visit to Windsor, after her accession, is in a higher strain :—

Lady, with not irreverent hand I lay
 This post-tribute at thy sovereign feet.
 O ! Queen of England, glorious was the day
 When thou wert call'd to the monarchic seat—
 Ruler of willing isles, and ocean's rolling sheet.

Glad shouts of thousands echoed to the sky
 In triumph, as thy palfrey pranced along ;
 Joy gleam'd in every straining British eye,
 And aged men and matrons join'd the throng ;
 Whilst youths and maidens danced, or swell'd the choral song.

Bright shone the sunlight on thy royal head,
 As if the skies were glad to view thee there ;
 Nature seem'd happy, as a bride new wed,
 And wafted strains of music through the air,
 To bless her as she went, our Sovereign, young and fair.

A tower of British hearts did guard thy way—
 Hearts that would leap to battle at thy call ;
 Men strong and firm—breasts of the sternest clay,
 Whom Danger's fiercest shafts could ne'er appal,
 Nor Death's grim terrors daunt—an adamant wall !

These were thy champions ! these thy swords of flame !
 Who rear'd thy banners, and thy laurels bore :
 Whilst lovely virgins breathed thy royal name,
 And strewed fresh garlands o'er thy chariot door,
 And pray'd that England's Queen might reign for evermore.

Lo ! now where Windsor's towers ascend the sky,
 Bidding defiance to the raging blast—
 Pause ! kings and mighty potentates there lie,
 Whose name and fame even time can ne'er o'ercast.
 Proud Queen ! even thou must cease this lofty state at last !

Oh, noble sight—what giant oaks are here !
 Oaks that a thousand years have mock'd at Time !
 These stalwart boughs for tempests have no fear,
 But seem as steadfast now as in their prime :
 Grim watchmen of the past—in hoary age sublime !

A thousand winters have the storm-winds swept
 In terror o'er that fearless solitude ;
 A thousand summers have the wild-birds kept
 Their halcyon holiday in field and wood ;
 A thousand years those brooks have swell'd the eternal flood.

Ope wide the gates—Britannia's Queen draws near !
 Throw wide the gates—another sovereign reigns !
 Last time the bolts fell, pass'd a monarch's bier—
 A sainted corpse was borne along the plains.
 Youth, beauty, enters now—the King of kings ordains !

Low sounds of wailing rose along each aisle,
 Feet scarcely heard, and mournful sighs suppress !
 Now, shouts of triumph roll'd around the pile,
 Loud joy and gladness swell'd each heaving breast—
 And where pale Death had trod, the cheering people prest !

Gaze ye around—lo ! monarchs in their pall
 Frown from their solemn sculptur'd niches dread ;
 Or, crown'd and sceptred, swarm along the wall
 In portraits, by some ancient limner dead—
 Lines sanctified by age, by genius garlanded.

Young Queen, behold the outlines dim and drear
 Of mighty ALFRED, chief of sword and lyre ;
 HAROLD the dauntless—dreadless—without fear,
 Who charged the Norman with a brand of fire ;
 And Cœur-de-Lion King, of battles' boasts the sire.

See, gentle Queen, among those warrior men,
 One like thyself, whilst yet that Queen was young—
 ELIZABETH, the proudest princess then
 Who wore a crown, or was by poets sung,
 Or rose in history's page, on Fame's triumphant tongue.

The faith of Christ wax'd stronger 'neath her sway ;
 Error, and fraud, and tyranny sank down ;
 Truth flourish'd stronger—had a brighter day ;
 And genius mightier grew around her throne ;
 Whilst freedom triumph'd high, nor cared for tyrant's frown.

Lady, to such example would I rear
 Thy noble mind, and bend thy willing soul :
 She stood aloft, in virtue calm and clear,
 And swept away the tempests that might roll,
 Strong in her native self—beyond all base control !

Gaze reverently, fair Queen ! a thousand years
 Gather their memories o'er thy youthful head,
 Dim visions of the past—of hopes and fears—
 Crowd from these noiseless phantoms of the dead ;
 Ghost-kings inurn'd from sleep—from Death's funeral bed.

Having fairly by these specimens, established Mr. Ord's claim to the Laurel, we take leave of his editor's collection, which forms a very neat volume, and one which will, we make no doubt, be warmly welcomed by the lovers of poetry.

Lardner's Cabinet Library—A Manual of Electricity and Magnetism.

This is the first volume of a history of electricity, which is to occupy another volume ere the design is completed in a manner which is intended to render the work sufficient for the purposes of students of the science. The volume commences with a rather full history of the progressive discoveries in electrical science.

Historical Memorials relating to the Independents or Congregationalists, from their Rise to the Restoration of the Monarchy. Octavo, pp. 583. By Benjamin Hanbury. Vol. II. Fisher & Son, and Jackson & Walford.

The first volume of this work was noticed in this publication on its appearance, now some time since. The work has unexpectedly swelled considerably beyond the limits at first contemplated, and is now to be completed by a third volume, which is to appear as soon as it can be got ready. The contents of the present volume are of a very multifarious nature. They relate, to a considerable extent, to the progress and history of Independence in New England. The immense mass of documentary materials which has been collected since the work was commenced, has made an additional volume necessary to the permanent value of the work as a complete record. The present volume also contains a very full account of the struggles between the Independent and the Presbyterian party in the famous Westminster Assembly of Divines ; which may be read with advantage at this particular time in connexion with Baillie's Letters, especially by those who like to see both sides of a question.

The Philosophy of Shakspeare. By Michael Henry Rankin.

This is one of a class of books of which the reader never tires. It consists of sentences drawn from the rich mine of Shakspeare, and arranged under proper heads. The compiler has small merit in going right, for it is next to impossible to go wrong in compiling a Shaksperian hand-book.

The Seaman's Manual; containing a Treatise on Practical Seamanship, with Plates, a Dictionary of Sea Terms, and of the Customs and Usages of the Merchant Service, with the Laws relating to the Duties of Masters and Mariners. Moxon: London.

This useful work is compiled by Mr. Dana, the young American whose entertaining and interesting voyage, entitled, "Two Years before the Mast," lately called forth our warm approbation. The manual must be a valuable work to seamen, besides being generally instructive. It will also be quite an acquisition to those "land-lubbers" who delight in reading narratives of voyages, but also those salt-water romances, which are flooded with incomprehensible nautical terms. We now feel quite confident in employing such phrases as to keel-haul—to knock-off—watch-ho!—watch! We at last know the difference between caulking and paying the ship, and what it is to rig out a jib-boom. Ready! about! and helm's-a-lee! or mainsail haul! are to us no longer unintelligible sounds.

The Adventures of Mr. Obadiah Oldbuck.

This is a romance of love and chivalry in as many volumes as the reader pleases to divide it into. It consists entirely of pictures. Mr. Oldbuck's adventures, from the hour when he first obtains a sight of his lady-love, and is hopelessly smitten, until the happy denouement, which, after endless romantic vicissitudes and trials, exhibits him leading her to the altar, is all given by symbols and hieroglyphics. So much the better. If we are to have a book, let it be a book; if pictures, then pictures be it. The idea, and something more, of this very diverting piece of drollery and burlesque is borrowed from a Parisian work which obtained great vogue. The main fault of Mr. Oldbuck is, that he is not thoroughly nationalized,—that the work is still fully more French than English. As to borrowing from the French, that is nothing: we lend and take.

Let the reader, who wishes to have an idea of a work, which must be seen to be fully appreciated, suppose a small album, full of lithographed sketches, two or more on every leaf, which illustrate such points of history, as Mr. Oldbuck's ecstasy on first seeing his buxom lady-love;—his despair when, throwing himself ruefully against a willow tree, he sees her vanishing in the distance; let him imagine to himself Obadiah fairly in love, musing and melancholy in his solitary chamber; or trying to conquer the tender passion by study, which, finding ineffectual, he is exhibited making trial of music; and in another scene, abandoning his violincello, and throwing himself back on his chair in dark despair. The succeeding scene exhibits Mr. Oldbuck flying out of his window in transport on espying his lady-love in the street—and his utter annihilation on finding that she has once more vanished. In short, the whole Quixotic progress of this prince of romantic lovers is traced out, in nearly three hundred very clever plates, abounding in wit, satire, and fun, though probably of a kind to be more relished by the French than the English spectators of Obadiah's woes, trials, and final triumphs.

Abbott's Rollo Code of Morals.

A little book meant to teach young people their personal and relative moral duties, in a series of lessons, to which questions on the subject-matter of the lesson are appended.

Warwick's Guide to the present House of Commons. Saunders and Otley.

The design of this Manual is to give at one glance, without the necessity of a second reference, every important fact connected with the public and private history of the Members of the present House of Commons. An introduction gives a view of the nature and history of English Parliaments: and there is a good deal of useful miscellaneous information in a work which is comprehensive and accurate, without being bulky.

A Treatise upon Falconry. In two Parts. By James Cockburn Belany.

This author is an enthusiast for the noble sport of hawking, which, we imagine, is held in less indifference than he supposes. On the contrary, whether the revival of falconry be desirable or not, there are many symptoms of its resuscitation. Mr. Belany claims an immeasurable superiority for his favourite mode of sport over modern wholesale gun-slaughter. Nor is it without truth that he contends—

When a covey of birds is put up, the sportsman directs his shot either to one bird in particular, or to a number at random. If the discharge has been successful in killing the object, less pain is probably inflicted upon it, by this means, than by any other that could have been employed, to effect the same end; but if on the contrary, the game is only wounded, a lingering pain ending in death, with the loss of the bird, is the common consequence. Now this is an unalterable consequence of shooting, and instances of it will occur to a considerable amount with even the most steady and scrupulous of sportsmen. But when firing is made beyond a certain distance, or when two or three barrels are rashly discharged upon a covey rising close, which is too much the fashion of the day, the number wounded generally far exceeds the number killed; perhaps for every one bagged two or three flutter off, to pine away and perish. Now to take a similar glance at the hawk in the field.

When a covey of birds is put up to the hawk, the hawk makes his stoop upon a single bird only. Whatever be the number in the covey raised, none but the individual bird at which the stoop is made, receives the least hurt from it; and then that bird is either struck to the ground, and if not dead, instantly killed by the falconer; or escapes unscathed. When a hawk misses its first aim, which rarely happens if in proper order, it either takes its quarry at a subsequent effort, or the quarry gets into cover with no other harm than a good fright. Thus much, then, for the cruelty of hawking, as compared with the use of the gun in the field. A slight view of the pleasure, or other advantages of each, shall next be taken.

The pleasures of the fowling-piece, are said by Mr. Scott, to be extremely enticing; which to every lover of shooting they no doubt are. Agreeable, however, as they may be to the fowler, they are to be enjoyed or partaken of by none but himself; spectators in general recoil with dread from the report. This is a truism which even sportsmen themselves are not insensible of,—consequently shooting is unavoidably a selfish, or an unsocial pastime; and one, the gratification of which, is to be embraced, only by a solitary few, out of the great body of the people. The pleasures of hawking, however few or numerous, compared with those of shooting, are not confined to the falconer only, but may be enjoyed, with equal satisfaction, by a thousand of people at the same time, as conveniently as by a single individual; nay, if there is a person in the field whose enjoyment may seem less than another's, it is the falconer, whose time is least at liberty to dwell upon the delights of the sport.

He justly denounces the modern bloody and brutal battue, remarking—

To look into some of the respectable journals of the present day, and run over a few of the sporting notices, or witness some of their "unequaled feats" in the field, is enough to make one shrink at the very thought of the state of sport now, in this country. A sportsman is seen in the field with half a dozen double guns, carried, and loaded as fast as he can discharge them, by a train of vassals behind him, pouring showers of shot on every side, and carrying wholesale massacre over hills and valleys, and leaving the country overstrewn with maimed and mangled game. Alas! is this sport! Instead of finding pleasure at such a scene, who that is not dead to the proper sympathies of our nature, must not turn away from it with horror! As an example, I shall, in bonâ fide, lay one or two of these "battues" before my reader.

In the ———, it is stated that C—— G—— has killed in three days, upon the estate of ———, with six guns, considerably above a thousand head of game, six hundred of which were pheasants; averaging two hundred pheasants, and near to a hundred and fifty of other game each day. In another column it is likewise noticed, that M—— C—— bagged, between five o'clock a.m. and seven p.m., one hundred and twenty two brace and a half of grouse, and two hares, with three double guns and servants loading them. In three particular "points," that is, I suppose, three discharges of both barrels, he dropped seventeen birds. Now, under such extensive death, such chance work, firing amidst almost clouds of birds, (for such they may have been, when a gun was bringing down at the rate of six at a discharge,) where such a number were bagged, how many must have escaped to die from their wounds!

Could the ancestors of these gentlemen but raise their heads above the grave, and once witness such scenes of slaughter upon their inheritance, or see English sport thus outraged, how astonished would they look! Yet how much more astonished would they be, (whose honourable pride, tempered with generosity towards the meanest animal, lay in sparing the lives of all beyond a moderate portion,) nay, how would they blush to see the representatives of their ancient and honoured houses, making such acts of cruelty objects of notorious ambition! But they certainly would look with greater astonishment still, when they were told after all this, that great "refinement" had taken place in the taste of modern sportsmen; and that their noble falcon whose glorious wings had delighted the world for so many centuries, had led them so often with "joyous hearts" over their broad lands, and which, with their patrimony, they so carefully studied to preserve, for the enjoyment of their offspring, was now denied a spot of ground to rest upon, except the gibbet, by their favoured progeny, and that through the "advancement of civilisation."

One of the "enlightening" authors of the present day, very gravely asserts, that falconry has "retreated everywhere before the advancement of civilisation." He does not inform us upon what grounds he is led to make such an assertion; and I should hope there are few in this age who would venture to support such doctrine, when they are told that the cock-pit and the ring are in high fashion among the beau monde of the day; nay, supported even by some of the most wealthy of the land.

In returning to a comparison of the gun and the hawk, it need only be added, that where the taking of game is practised for profit only, or where the pleasure of the sport increases in a ratio with the destruction of life, or where unnecessary toil or overstraining fatigue, finds a reward in unnecessary death, the gun in general may be adjudged the superior. But where, besides a moderate portion of game, salutary exercise and agreeable recreation to the body and mind, are sought; where a well earned escape of the quarry from its bold pursuer, affords more pleasure than wanton slaughter, where the gentleman uses game only as an auxiliary dish at his table; and, next to having a few on his board, likes, in the good old English taste, to see them sporting over his grounds, in the free enjoyment of life and liberty, the gun is not to be spoken of in comparison with the hawk.

Thus much for the superiority of hawking, as a more rational and humane sport, than shooting game. But our author dwells upon, and magnifies its advantages on many other points, and gives full details of its history, its mysteries, and its numerous attractions. These are not much in our way; but as a specimen of a really agreeable book, we shall give an extract which, we are certain, will have charms for young readers:—

To see the hawks feed is a most interesting sight, and one that seldom fails to command the attention of even the rudest minds: the beautiful symmetry and graceful attitudes of the birds are then extremely attracting. The tutoring of them is likewise a most delightful recreation, and one in which both princes and nobles, in former times, took great pleasure; considering it neither too mean nor too toilsome for their own undertaking, to watch the progress of the pupil gradually yielding obedience to the rules of the teacher. To mark the blaud subtilties of art stealing imperceptibly between the bird and its own nature, until they gain a sure possession: then weaning it away, step by step, from its native wildness into a tame and sociable state—is a most interesting study.

The society, too, of the hawks, by every lover of this ancient sport, has always been regarded with peculiar interest; nor is this to be wondered at, when once the noble nature of these birds has been experienced. Our ancestors took great pride in having them placed, especially on "high times," or days of festivity, upon their blocks on the smooth sward in front of their halls, or on each side of their door, that they might be seen by their guests, or admired through the windows. This was a true old English fashion, and must have had a beautiful appearance placed in front of some of their stately buildings. Living at hack, their society is still more amusing: their lively appearance soaring around the house, perching about the doors or windows, following their master over his grounds, now skimming over his head, now alighting upon his fist, &c., render them extremely pleasing. It has already been observed, that in former times, they were often made the travelling companions of both ladies and gentlemen, and as such they became both faithful and affectionate ones. By the way, Sir John Sebright does not seem to allow hawks any claim to such a quality as affection or attachment to their keeper. This is a most erroneous notion, and appears the more singular emanating from the pen of a practical and experienced falconer. The following notice of a peregrine falcon, favoured me by a neighbouring gentleman, of the highest credibility, affords a very decisive proof of the attachment of the hawk to its master:—The bird was permitted to fly at large and range wherever it pleased. The summer being warm, and the sitting-room in consequence frequently open, it entered at all times of the day, and was a constant guest at the dinner-table, apparently more for the sake of society than of gratifying its appetite, for, hungry or not, it attended. It evinced great attachment, liked to be taken notice of, and if neglected would get upon its master's shoulder and pinch him gently by the ear. It was very fond of lying upon a lady's lap. The bird was perfectly harmless, though at times a little merrily waggish. A flock of seventeen turkeys frequented a pasture close by the house, under the guidance of a huge turkey-cock, who had long been the bully of the poultry yard. The hawk circling above the plump of birds would stoop with amazing velocity, and strike within a hair's breadth of the crimson head of their leader; a general panic ensued, the word was given scavez qui peut, the devil take the hindmost, and the whole array, the old patriarch amongst the first, would fly in disorder to a thick hedge for shelter, with more than usual noise and gabble. Birds smaller than itself it never molested, but hesitated not to play off its pranks upon the largest that came in its way. A brood hen was the only individual of the feathered tribe that ever offered to resent its wagging. It, however, never attempted to injure the young.

Mr. Belany had a favourite hawk, of which he gives this interesting account:—

I myself have had hawks which exhibited as strong signs of attachment to me as ever a dog did to its master. One falcon in particular, which travelled with me upwards of two thousand miles, became so very fond of my company, that she would scarcely sit at rest but in my presence. A delicate state of health having induced me to seek the benefits of a change of air and scenery in an excursion through a few of the different counties in the south of England, I, instead of taking with me the usual companion of the wanderer, a dog, took a falcon upon my fist. A gentleman joined at London for the tour.

The falcon approved herself not only an affectionate and faithful, but a most enchanting companion. She had not only such influence as to procure us free access to many of the preserves of the squires and knights that lay in our route, where, amongst partridges and pheasants, she astonished their proprietors; but also the power of acting as a magical passport to the smiles and graces of their fair families: thus affording us opportunities of experiencing the hospitality of their rural mansions. She was a general favourite wherever we went, not less with the ladies than with the gentlemen; and at every inn or village in which for a few days we beat up quarters, she seldom failed to gain for us

Passing favours and most matchless friends.

The enjoyments she afforded us were often as diversified as the landscapes we travelled through; and the strange contrasts of character which she had the virtue of bringing around her, never failed to yield new interest and amusement to her fellow-travellers. At one time we beheld her surrounded by "high aristocrats and ladies fair;" at another encompassed by a regiment of ragamuffin boys and girls, who often did us the uncalculated honour to escort us through the streets and villages as we passed along, despite many modest and heart-felt expressions from my friend declining all such proofs of public esteem, which he declared to be quite unmerited on our part, and due only to a band of blind fiddlers. One day we beheld her basking in the smiles and graces of a fine lady,—the next outdone by the overwhelming encomiums of a drunken landlord.

During the whole of our travels, whether by steam-boats, stage-coaches, post-chaises, gigs, omnibuses, vans, on foot or on horseback, she sat upon my hand, and wherever we strayed, whether in public or private house, her perch under night was in my bed-room; and during the day, except when out of doors, upon a block, always in the same apartment with her companions. Thus accustomed to be in my company, her attachment became so strong, that she appeared always restless and dissatisfied when not beside me; or, as a lady once observed, "she never seemed pleased but in the presence of her lord." After an excursion of from four to five months duration, we returned to London, where she died shortly afterwards, but not before she had delighted many of her metropolitan admirers by a few beautiful flights at pigeons. Her death was caused by too close confinement in the city, having brought on a disease of the stomach.

Being in private lodgings, where none but the servants of the family and my own friends were in the habit of entering, she became so "perfectly at home" that she would sometimes walk out of one room into another in search of me; would follow me from one apartment to another, and come from the most distant part of the house even in the dark, or with the hood on, when I chose to call her. This she has done often in the presence of my friends. If I happened to sleep past my usual rising hour, she would leave her block, (which stood in a corner of the room with a piece of canvass spread around it to prevent her mutes from soiling the carpet,) fly into the bed and take me gently by the ear; or if I happened to be absent for any length of time, or had been late in coming in at night, she, being accustomed to see me much at home, and, likewise, to be regularly spoken to and stroked gently on the breast before I retired to rest, would come off her block, wander round the room, and finding the door shut, take a place close by the threshold, and there wait patiently until my return. Nor could the inmates induce her to return to the block. As soon, however, as I entered, she would fly to my arm, get upon my shoulder, rub her beak against my cheek, showing every token of welcome and gladness at my return. For about a week previous to her death, she refused to take any food; and for the last three or four nights she had regularly left her block and wandered in the dark to my bedside, but not being able to get upon it, had crept as close to the head of it, or to where she had heard me breathing, as she could get, and there remained almost motionless until I arose. During the last night she had come to the bedside in the same manner; and in the morning, on looking over, I saw her broad wing stretched upon the floor cold and stiff. She had come to my bedside either under the vain hope of finding relief from me, or through a desire to be near me to the last.

In honour of the bird, and as a proof that the heroic or romantic spirit of the ladies of old has not yet altogether become extinct in this country, it may here be mentioned that a handsome set of hawk-harness, the gift of two of her fair admirers, was on its way to be presented to her on the day she died. It consisted of a pair of silver bells, a splendidly decorated hood, lined with white satin, a silken plaited leash, with the bird's name, SAPPHO, wrought in needle-work upon it, and a finely turned block, with her name also inscribed upon it.

The Forget-me-Not for 1842.

This elder-born of the prolific family of the Annals is, in all probability, also destined to be the survivor of the race. Its longevity may be predicted from its unpretending character and the quality of its wares. Its strength does not lie in names that are in temporary vogue, but in really fulfilling the object of a small and tasteful Gift-Book for the young—a literary souvenir, consisting of picture, poetry, and tale. In the present season, "The Forget-me-Not" comes forth in great force in each of these departments. The designs are all of them good, and neatly executed; and, above all, they belong to the real life lying around us, and not the tawdry and mawkish ideal. Montgomery, Shelton Mackenzie, Calder Campbell, Laman Blanchard, Mrs. Sigourney, and Miss Gould, (another American poetess,) have each contributed several copies of verses; and the Tales by Mrs. Gore, Miss Lawrence, Allan Cunningham, and other favourites of the public, may vie with those of any Annual of any season. A wild and powerful tale, depicting the struggles of superstitious feeling, with the newly excited passion of avarice, is entitled the Santa Trinidad. The dreary scene is the outer Hebrides, on whose iron coasts a vessel of this name, the treasure-ship of the Spanish Armada, had been wrecked and sunk centuries before the tale opens. Attached to the Portrait of Miranda, a melancholy beauty, painted by Drummond, there is an exceedingly piquant sketch; and Mrs. Gore's two little stories are marked by the grace and buoyancy which distinguish even her slightest sketches. In short, "The Forget-me-Not for 1842" is altogether a very pretty book of its kind.

CORN LAW PAMPHLETS.

Pamphlets on this absorbing subject are so plentiful at present, that we can only now mention the more remarkable among them. One well deserving attention is intitled a PLEA FOR TOTAL AND IMMEDIATE REPEAL. It gives a Table, showing the vast increase of Rent in Scotland—or the increase of Rent in a hundred Parishes, between 1791 and 1840. Many of these increased rents were stated in the Articles upon the Poor Laws of Scotland, which last year appeared in this Magazine, and need not be here repeated. The Table shows, that whatever interest has suffered or is suffering, land rental is in a flourishing condition ; affording the fair presumption that landowners are not among the distressed classes. Their rentals have been increased double, triple, and in many cases four-fold and upwards, within the last fifty years.

A FEW REMARKS on the CORN, TIMBER, and SUGAR DUTIES, &c., &c., as an Address to the Electors of Preston. By One of the Broad Cloth.—In this Address, Agitation ! agitation ! agitation ! is strenuously urged, and the objects recommended to be agitated for are worthy of being obtained at any honest price.

A LETTER to the QUEEN in behalf of her SUFFERING PEOPLE. By the Poor Man's Friend ; and a PLAIN and EARNEST APPEAL to the FEARS of the LANDLORDS.—This writer contends that the People must be much more in angry earnest to obtain bread and meat at a fair price—(it is a fallacy to call it cheap bread, as no one asks food to be more or less cheap than an unrestricted trade in corn and provisions permits)—than they were for reform, when their voice ten years since was omnipotent. He does not think it yet too late to concede their just demand, though he believes that every hour that justice is denied, is pregnant with increasing danger.

THE BREAD-EATER'S ADVOCATE.—A new cheap periodical, devoted to the promotion of the good cause.

ADDRESS of the CONFERENCE of MINISTERS LATELY HELD at MANCHESTER.—As this short and pithy tract will be extensively circulated, we shall not say more about it than to cite one passage, in which the Ministers express their opinions, on the matter at issue, and state what they consider to be their duty at the present crisis :—

"As Christian Ministers, prizing above all other considerations the interests of morality and religion, we have been unable to anticipate, without apprehension and dread, the growth and developement of those passions which are stimulated and called into action by hunger and destitution.

Fellow Countrymen ! We have asked ourselves if the calamities we have been called to contemplate, and the more dreadful consequences with which we are threatened, are to be regarded as the just judgment and visitation of the Almighty ; and our unanimous answer is, NO. We have sought instruction in the Word and through the Works of God, and have been taught by both, that a bountiful and unfailing provision has been made for the wants of every living creature. We stand forth, therefore, to assert and vindicate the Divine Wisdom and Beneficence ; we charge existing misery and impending danger upon the selfish and ignorant inventions of man, which have frustrated the merciful designs of the Ruler of the Universe. The chastisements we are enduring are self-inflicted : our national distresses are the results of a departure, by human legislation, from the spirit and mandates of the Divine Law ; and our strong conviction is, that our present deliverance and future safety are to be secured only by recognising and observing the unerring and clearly revealed will of a Beneficent Creator.

Our duty, as Ministers of Religion, is plain. On Scriptural grounds we are called upon to denounce all human restrictions upon the supply of food to the people, and to employ all appropriate means to place the fatherly provision of God within the reach of his suffering and famishing children.

In the attainment of this object we affectionately call upon the Christian public to aid us by an instant, a combined, and a vigorous effort. The case is one of extreme urgency. The poor are daily perishing ; and, though we commend the exercise of individual charity towards those who are at present suffering from want, we must declare our solemn conviction, that all assistance will prove ineffectual to the relief of prevailing wretchedness during the continuance of laws which impiously interfere with, and limit, the enjoyment of the all-sufficient bounties of Divine Providence.

Our first advice to our brethren and friends throughout the country, is, to investigate the subject now before them. Let every one convinced of the justice and necessity of abolishing those laws do all in his power, in the spirit of meekness and love, to enlighten and convince those who are around him. Under the responsibilities of citizenship, let every opportunity be embraced of bringing the nature and effects of the Corn and Provision Laws under the notice of the Legislature."

POOR LAWS and PAUPERISM in SCOTLAND, reprinted from the last Number of The Westminster Review.—The writer of this able article entertains sound views on the subject. A LETTER to the SESSION of ST. JOHN'S PARISH, EDINBURGH, on their VIOLATION of the LAWS of GOD in the CONDUCT they have displayed to HENRY BUTTERS. By a Citizen.—The writer of this letter contends, that in persecuting and imprisoning a poor Confectioner for selling a penny-worth of sweatmeats to a child during the hours of public service on Sunday, the Church Session of St. John's are guilty of a much more heinous sin than that which they punished, and of a much grosser violation of the fundamental principles of Christianity.

TYTLER'S HISTORY of SCOTLAND, Vol. V.—In this new volume, of what has been emphatically pronounced "The History of Scotland," the reign of James the Fourth is concluded; that of James Fifth, a stirring and eventful epoch in Scottish annals, is begun and finished, and we fairly enter upon the history of the Reformation, and of Queen Mary's reign; when the Scottish nation assumes a quite new aspect. On this important portion of the work, Mr. Tytler has bestowed the greatest pains. His diligent research among accumulated State Papers, and patient investigation and balancing of conflicting evidence, render his work one of high authority, and redeem, at least, Scottish National History from the common reproach of being of no more value than an Old Almanac.

POLITICAL REGISTER.

THE last four weeks have been distinguished by three remarkable events—the birth of a prince and heir to the Throne, the destruction of the Great Armoury at the Tower, and a great forgery of Exchequer bills. The prince was born on the 9th November, and the event was celebrated in the usual style throughout the kingdom by the firing of guns and the drinking of healths. The queen and the prince, up to the date of the latest accounts, are going on favourably.—The fire at the Tower commenced on the evening of the 30th October; and, owing to a scarcity of water, the tide being back, raged with great fury for many hours. The Great Armoury, and nearly the whole of its contents, were completely destroyed; and the Jewel Room, containing the Crown Jewels, was for some time in much danger. The jewels were rescued with difficulty, but fortunately without any loss. The damage was at first greatly exaggerated, but has now been ascertained not to exceed £250,000. About 100,000 muskets were destroyed, but their loss is the less to be regretted, as they were all flint muskets, and a large proportion of them old and much worn. We cannot doubt that the recent destruction of the Houses of Parliament, the Royal Exchange, and Tower Armoury, will lead to the better construction of our public buildings. We do not believe that there is any necessity for using wood, or any other combustible material, in the construction of such buildings. In Italy very little wood is used in the erection of the fine buildings. Flat brick arches, with a bar of iron running through their length, to prevent lateral pressure, are used instead of wooden beams.

A similar construction has been adopted in the Register House in this city, and were a fire to break out in any one of the chambers, it could not possibly communicate to another. If any objection exists to arches, beams of cast iron, already much used, might be substituted; and if to these were added brick or stone floors, and iron doors and window shutters, and a metal roof supported by metal frame-work, the destruction of buildings by fire would be rendered impossible. The cause of the fire has not been ascertained; but there is every reason to believe that it was occasioned by the flues being overheated. It is remarkable that the use of these flues should be so general, as the risk of fire is so great from them, that every Insurance Office increases the rate of insurance from 1s. 6d. to 2s. 6d. per cent. where they are used.—The discovery of a forgery of Exchequer bills, to the amount of £350,000, has created much sensation. The principal party implicated—Mr. Smith, chief clerk in the Exchequer Bill Office—has been committed for trial on the charge of having forged the bills, or having uttered them knowing them to be forged. Mr. Rapallo, a broker, is also in custody. Owing to the paper, engraving, and everything but the signatures being genuine, the distinction between the forged and the genuine bills can hardly be observed. Some difference of opinion prevails whether the Government is, or is not, bound to indemnify the holders. It appears that three parties were in the practice, under the authority of an act of Parliament, of signing these bills, and not in their own name, by procuration, as in mercantile transactions, but by using and imitating the signature of their principal. It is singular to imagine how any one could propose, or how Parliament could sanction, so irregular a proceeding, and which rendered it next to impossible to discover forged bills from genuine.—Alderman Pirie, a native of Dunee, has been elected Lord Mayor of London.—The Queen-dowager has, for about a month, been confined to bed. The disease by which she has been attacked is an affection of the lungs, and no hopes are entertained of her recovery.

ENGLAND.

Great activity prevails at the dock-yards of Deptford, Woolwich, Sheerness, Chatham, Portsmouth, Plymouth, and Pembroke, there being nearly thirty ships fitting out for active service. Ten fifty-gun frigates have been ordered to be built. Great difficulty is found in obtaining able-bodied seamen, there being a great demand for the United States' navy as well as mercantile marine, in which they are better treated and better paid than in our own. To endeavour, if possible, to avoid resorting to the press-gang, ordinary seamen and landsmen, of good character, not less than five feet seven inches in height, nor exceeding twenty-five years of age, are received, and a great number of landsmen have entered the service. A much better plan would be to increase the pay, and thereby secure the services of able seamen; for surely there cannot be worse economy than to drive our best seamen to a country with which there is much probability of our soon being at war, and to intrust our chief arm—the navy—to incompetent hands. But so much of our revenue is expended on the aristocracy and their retainers, that we are unable to pay our sailors as they ought to be paid.

INCENDIARY FIRES, arising, no doubt, from the destitute condition of the people, have become almost of daily occurrence. We find numerous fires have taken place in the counties of Lincoln, Gloucester, Wilts, and Oxford, generally of ricks, stacks, and out-buildings. We are glad to say that neither on this, nor on any other occasion which we recollect of, has this absurd and cowardly mode of showing discontent been exhibited in Scotland.

FINANCE.—How the deficiency in the revenue is to be made up, has not yet transpired. A commission has been appointed to inquire into the collection of the revenue, with the view to retrenchment; the re-establishment of lotteries is talked of; and the penny-postage, judging from inquiries which have been made, is by no means safe.

SCOTLAND.

SUNDAY DESACRATION.—The recent attempt to prevent the running of coaches on, and even to stop the conveyance of the mail by, the Edinburgh and Glasgow railway on Sunday, has already had a serious influence in depreciating the stock. No longer ago than 28th July last, when £40 a share had been paid, the shares were selling at £39, 10s.; now that other £10 per share has been paid, they are only worth £44, 5s. Since the stopping of the trains on Sunday has been so much agitated, the price has sunk rapidly; so that, taking into account the interest on the instalments, about £7 per share have been lost during four months; and seeing that there are 18,000 shares, the proprietors of this single railway have lost, within four months, £126,000, by the attempt to enforce an ultra-puritanical observance of the Sunday. Nor is this to be wondered at, considering that at least one-seventh of the revenue expected to be derived from the railway will be sacrificed, if there is to be no Sunday travelling. The total capital is £900,000, and £300,000 have been borrowed at five per cent. The annual expense of the railway will not probably be less than that of the Manchester and Liverpool, which is above £1000 per mile; so that £100,000 a-year must be drawn, before any dividend whatever can be got by the proprietors. Where capitals of so large amount as those required for railways are expended, it is of the utmost importance that the undertakings should be allowed to remain as short time as possible idle. On all the English railways, trains for passengers are run on Sunday; and as the great bulk of the shareholders of the Edinburgh and Glasgow railway are Englishmen, it is exceedingly improbable that they ever contemplated the railroad was not to be wrought on Sunday. Indeed, if the observance of the Sunday is to be enforced in the manner proposed, it is very doubtful if any Scotch railway will remunerate the projectors. At all events, English railway stock must necessarily prove a better investment for capital. Whether the Purists propose to stop the mail altogether on Sunday, or to run it by the high road on that day, does not appear; but in either case, much greater Sunday desecration will occur than if the railroad were employed. At least forty horses and ten men must be employed for each mail from Edinburgh to Glasgow. Two of these—the guard and driver—will be employed five hours each trip, while by railway they would be employed only two hours, and they would require little or no assistance. If it is proposed to stop the conveyance of the mail altogether, then there will be numerous expresses sent, and a great number of persons prevented from attending divine worship; so that, in every view, the Sunday will be better observed by allowing the mail to proceed by railway than in any other manner. There seems to be no reason to doubt, that since the establishment of the Post-office in 1635, the mail has been uniformly conveyed on the Sunday without complaint. But here it may be worth while to inquire—

WHETHER TRAVELLING ON SUNDAY BY PUBLIC COACH IS ILLEGAL.—Since the Union, only two statutes against breaking the Sunday have been enacted: one against killing game, and another against opening any room for public entertainment, or debating, to which persons are admitted by tickets or money. Before the Union, there are numerous statutes on the subject both in England and Scotland. In England, holding fairs or markets, bull or bear baiting, acting plays, or other unlawful exercises, and working on the Lord's day, are prohibited; also the travelling of drovers, carriers, or the like. Under these statutes, a van travelling on Sunday has been held illegal, but not a stage-coach; although the statute 29 Charles II. prohibits all persons from "worldly labour, business, or working at their ordinary calling."—Cordeman v. Breach, 7 B. & C. 96. Watermen in the Thames, and hackney-coaches, are also allowed to ply; and fish carriages, whether laden or not, may travel. Bread and mackerel may be sold, and pies baked, under certain restrictions. It was never held, either by lawyers or divines, that these statutes were intended to enforce a pharisaical observance of the Sunday. Blackstone says that they "rather impliedly allow any innocent amusement or recreation after divine service is over." Paley was of the same opinion. He states that "St. Paul appears to have considered the Sabbath as part of the Jewish ritual, and not obligatory upon Christians as such: 'Let no man, therefore, judge you in meat or in drink, or in respect of an holiday, or of the new moon, or of the Sabbath-days, which are a shadow of things to come, but the body is of Christ;'" and adds, "The opinion, that Christ and his apostles meant to retain the duties of the Jewish Sabbath, shifting only the day from the seventh to the first, seems to prevail without sufficient proof." The earliest Scotch acts, like those of England, prohibit fairs and markets on Sunday, and generally the buying and selling of goods, "handie-labouring, and working." The latest and leading act in which the offences are enumerated, is immediately after the Restoration, 1661, chap. 18, and prohibits "salmon-fishing, going of salt-pans, milns, or kilns, hiring of shearers, carrying of loads, keeping of markets, or using any sorts of merchandise on Sunday, and all other profanation thereof whatsoever." But neither in this nor any other Scotch act is travelling on Sunday prohibited. Very few questions have occurred on the meaning of these Acts. An attempt was made, some years ago, to stop the running of a stage-coach, but the case was never determined, the proprietors having become bankrupt; in 1828 another attempt was made to stop the sailing of a steam-boat between Dundee and Broughty Ferry with passengers on Sunday; but the prosecution was quashed on an informality. The Sheriff-depute, in dismissing the action, remarked that, looking to what is tolerated in both ends of the island, there was no room for maintaining the sailing of the steam-boat was a profanation of the Sunday: "In England, stage-coaches, and all other land conveyances, as well as water conveyances are permitted on Sunday as lawful acts. It is not maintained by the pursuers that the running of the mail-coach with passengers is a profanation of the Sabbath, or the using of hackney-coaches, post-chaises, gigs, and caravans of every description, saddle-horses, &c. The employment too of ferry-boats is sanctioned by universal practice, as quite lawful on Sundays; and vessels with goods and passengers sail on that day of the week from all ports in Scotland, and as it may happen, arrive there on Sabbath, and set ashore without objection from any quarter. The steam-boat in question does not sail till after the morning and afternoon service is over; and if those who use it are upon their necessary and lawful affairs, there can be no more blame on the part of the defender in hiring his vessel to them than would attach to the owner of a passage-boat hired to go to Broughty Ferry. It is believed, and may be assumed, that many of those who avail themselves of the privilege of going to and returning from Broughty Ferry by the defender's passage-boat are hard-working people employed in a sedentary occupation from Monday morning to Saturday night, and who, after attending divine service once or twice a-day, make a sea trip during a summer evening, for the sake of health and recreation, and to enable them the better to resume their weekly labours, and thereby earn a subsistence for themselves and families. It humbly appears to the Sheriff that there is no sufficient ground for charging persons acting in this way with profaning the Sabbath." When the case came before the Court of Session, the Lord President (Hope) remarked, that none of the statutes applied to the fact libelled; and, in answer to a statement by the counsel for the interdictors, that they had a great deal to say on the merits, his Lordship observed, "You will certainly require to do so;" thus indicating his opinion, that the sailing of the steam-boat was perfectly legal. In a later case, the magistrates of Dundee, and afterwards the Court, by a majority of three to two, held that a barber's apprentice could be compelled to shave ordinary customers on Sunday morning; but this decision was reversed on appeal, on the ground that such shaving was ordinary handicraft, and did not come within the exception of works of "necessity and mercy" allowed by the Confession of Faith. By the regulations of the magistrates of Edinburgh, (26th September, 1832,) "On Sunday, one-fourth of the hackney-coaches licensed, shall attend at each stance from ten A.M. till ten P.M., in rotation of numbers," thus compelling Sunday desecration by express regulation. At common law it has been found in Scotland, that steps of legal execution, such as arrestments, poindings, &c., executed on a Sunday, are bad, but that it is no objection to a private deed or transaction. If the mails are to be stopped on Sunday, ferry-boats cannot with any decency be permitted; and the plying of hackney-coaches, post-chaises, and other hired conveyances, must be prohibited. We suspect, however, that the Pharisees have no notion of going this length, but mean to allow all who are able to hire a conveyance for themselves, to desecrate the Sunday by travelling as much as they choose. They forget, that if the Jewish observance of the Sabbath is to be enforced, it may go farther than they may wish. Few, we believe, are prepared to go the whole length of the commandment—"In the Sabbath thou shalt not do any work, thou, nor thy son, nor thy daughter, thy man-servant nor thy maid-servant, nor thy cattle, nor the stranger that is within thy gates." The rigid observance of this rule is beyond modern cant and hypocrisy. Instead of an ascetic observance of the Sunday being favourable to the morals of the working-classes it is quite the reverse. Mr. Alison, the present Sheriff of Lanarkshire, when examined before the Committee of the House of Commons on Combinations of Workmen, stated, "I should think that there are 10,000 men in Glasgow who get drunk every Saturday night, who are drunk all Sunday, are in a state of half intoxication all Monday, and go to work on Tuesday. I think it would be of the last importance if you could get some kind of amusement for the people which would lead them out of public-houses and brothels; and, in that point of view, I am decidedly of opinion, that the overstrained observance of the Sunday has a more prejudicial than beneficial effect in manufacturing towns. I think that the observance of Sunday in Catholic countries on the Continent is much more conducive to benefit than the strict observance of it in Scotland." What could be a better or more healthy amusement than to allow them to make excursions into the country by the railroads?

We are glad to find, since the above was written, that the Directors of the Edinburgh and Glasgow Railway have determined, by a large majority, to run Passenger trains as well as convey the Mails on Sunday, at such hours as shall not interfere with divine service; but the resolution is not to be acted on till it be submitted to the body of the proprietors at their half-yearly meeting, on the 28th of February. Little doubt is entertained that their sanction will be obtained, as the great bulk of the proprietors are Englishmen, few of whom entertain the extreme notions regarding the observance of the Sunday which of late prevail with some classes in Scotland. The clergy, who have been punishing shopkeepers by heavy fines or three-weeks' imprisonment, for selling sweetmeats to children, are of course indignant at this resolution, and the failure of all their efforts to stop Railway trains on Sunday, and have pledged themselves still to persevere; but the question may be considered as set at rest. A threat is held out of appealing to the Courts of Law to prohibit the running of trains; but it is the opinion of many eminent Lawyers that it is perfectly legal, and the Clergy have already a sufficient quantity of Law business on their hands.

IRELAND.—Mr. O'Connell has been elected the first Lord Mayor for Dublin under the New Irish Incorporation Act. He stood for Alderman in two Wards, and was returned by both. Of sixty Aldermen and Councillors, of which the New Town Council is composed, the Liberals have returned twelve Aldermen and thirty-seven Councillors; the Tories three Aldermen and eight Councillors. Of fifteen Wards the Liberals have triumphed in twelve. A like ascendancy of the Liberals in other places is anticipated. Mr. O'Connell is the first Catholic who has been elected Lord Mayor for 150 years. At his election, being asked what course he would pursue with regard to the Repeal of the Union, he stated that in his office of Lord Mayor no person should know what his politics were, but as a private individual he was a Repealer. He scandalized the feelings of the Orangemen by going to Mass in procession, and in his robes of office, on the first Sunday after his election. As a fine of £50 is imposed by law on persons in office attending a Catholic place of worship in their official costume Mr. O'Connell took off his robes at the door of the Church, resuming them again on going out. The Repeal Association meets weekly, but the question does not appear to make much progress. Mr. Sharman Crawford has written several Letters to the Repealers condemning the further Agitation of Repeal. Some of the most active of the Repealers have seceded, and the impracticability of the Repeal must daily become more apparent even to the most sanguine; for while the probability is, that by far the larger portion of the Irish themselves are unfavourable to Repeal, they have not the slightest support in England or Scotland. A Repeal Board of Trade has been formed, the object of which is to encourage Irish manufactures by selling and using Irish goods to the exclusion of British. If Britain were to retaliate this exclusive system, we suspect that Ireland would find herself the loser in every point of view.

THE CONTINENT.—The insurrection in Spain is already over, and many of the leaders have suffered the punishment of traitors for their rashness and folly. The pension of Queen Christina has very properly been stopped.

No doubt exists that Louis Philippe countenanced this outbreak for his own ends; and the circumstance that he has stationed an army of observation on the Spanish frontier, appears to show that designs on Spain are still entertained by him. There has also been an attempt to get up an insurrection in Belgium, but it was discovered before it broke out. It appears to have been a very small affair, and the preparations were totally inadequate to the object in view. About twenty persons were arrested. They are mostly military men, at least they have military titles, but only two of them belong to the Belgian army. To prevent any similar outbreak, the king of France has stationed an army of 20,000 men on the Belgian frontier. There has been some talk in France about the disarmament of the French navy; but it appears that all that is intended is, to give a portion of the sailors leave to engage in the Merchant Service for a few months, while the ships themselves are not to be disarmed at present, but only at a future period, the place of their crews being in the meantime supplied by conscripts. Quenisset, and his accomplices, in the attempt to assassinate the princes, were brought to trial on the 15th November. Some important disclosures are said to have been made before the Committee of the House of Peers appointed to investigate the matter, and the most vigilant precautions are taken in Paris to maintain the public tranquillity. The private accounts from Paris state that an insurrection may soon be expected, and writers of all parties predict a social revolution. Secret societies are everywhere at work, and quietness is maintained only by the overwhelming military force by which the capital is occupied. The German Commercial League, originated by our own exclusive system, proceeds apace. Hanover and Lunenburg have joined the Confederacy, and Brunswick is expected soon to follow their example.

UNITED STATES.—The verdict in the case of M^rLeod, who was found not guilty after a long trial, and the liberation of Grogan, have delayed the breaking out of hostilities; but the unsettled state of the Boundary question, and the right of search of slave-vessels, are subjects which will, in all probability, sooner or later occasion a war, unless they can be settled by arbitration.

TRADE AND COMMERCE.

We are sorry to be unable to report any favourable change in the state of trade and commerce. On the contrary, the number of bankruptcies appears to be rather increasing, and the number of persons living on charity is weekly augmenting. At Paisley, the distress is steadily becoming greater, and at present nearly nine thousand are receiving relief. At Carlisle, families of five or six individuals are subsisting on four or five shillings a-week. Even in Edinburgh, few as her manufactures are, the destitution is considerable; and it was considered more advisable to get up a subscription for the support of the poor, than to testify the joy of the inhabitants for the birth of a prince in the usual form of an illumination. Though it is unquestionably the Corn Laws to which a great part, if not the whole, of this misery is to be attributed, the prospect of their repeal, or of any considerable alteration in them, appears to be getting more and more distant. Some of the richest and most influential of the landed aristocracy, are said to have entered into a combination to oppose every change, however inconsiderable; and it is not likely that Sir Robert Peel will risk the breaking up of his ministry, through sympathy with the sufferings of the working-classes. The notion indeed of these classes themselves, that they would not be benefited by a repeal of the laws against the importation, is not yet entirely dissipated, and the ministry will be very glad to avail themselves of the delusion to keep things as they are. The recent favourable news from America has had a beneficial effect in the clothing districts, but not so much as was anticipated. At Manchester, although some extensive orders from America had been received, the improvement expected was not realized; and the market for manufactured goods, and particularly for printing-cloths, continues as depressed as ever. At Leeds, an operative enumeration committee has been organized. From a minute and careful visitation of the town by twenty individuals, it appears that there are in the borough 4752 families, comprising 19,936 individuals, (of whom only 3780 are employed,) whose gross income amounts to £937, 19s. 1d., giving to each individual 11½d. a-week. Of 5746 loom-stands in Paisley, 3158 are unemployed and 871 unoccupied. There are 440 empty houses and 100 empty shops. At Stockport, the quantity of provisions given away to able-bodied paupers, who are not admitted into the workhouse, has increased steadily from £2343 in the week ending the 5th August, to £8061 in the week ending 21st October. At Nottingham, 463 persons were in the poor-house in June, and 722 on the 23d October. For the distress almost universally existing, ministers, it is said, intend to apply the remedy of emigration; but we doubt the possibility of raising funds to a sufficient extent for the alleviation of the evil. Besides many of those in distress are quite unfitted for the colonization of a new country,—both from their ignorance of the arts, and of the sort of labour required, and their deficiency in physical strength.

AGRICULTURE.

On the night of the 20th October, there was a considerable fall of snow, and not only the Grampians, but the Ochills, Pentlands, and some of the lower ranges of hills, continued white for a day. In the Grampians, the snow was about a foot deep, and has continued since. In Mid Lothian and East Lothian, the fields were, with hardly any exception, clear of grain by the 1st November; but in the shires of Fife, Stirling, Kinross, and Perth, a considerable quantity was in the field. At the same date, in the more northern counties—as Ross, Aberdeen, and Inverness—part of the crop remained uncut, and nearly one half of it was in the stacks in bad condition; a great proportion having sprung, and part of it being entirely rotten. In the same counties, the turnip crop was inferior. Potatoes throughout Scotland appear to be a good crop: but we fear that many of them, owing to the wet weather, were taken up under circumstances very unfavourable for their keeping, and considerable damage has also been sustained by the frost. In Ireland, generally, the potatoes have turned out an inferior crop; and in the neighbourhood of Limerick the supply is reported to be not one-third what is required. As to the corn crops in that country, it is now certain that they are considerably below an average, whilst the quality both of oats and wheat is very inferior. Throughout England, now that a considerable part of the crop has been thrashed, it has been ascertained that it is deficient both in quantity and quality; and there can be no doubt, that at least one million of quarters additional of foreign grain will be required. The sowing of wheat has been everywhere much retarded, first by the excessive rains in October, and subsequently by the frost which set in about the middle of November; so that it is probable that a large breadth of wheat land will have to be sown in the spring.

Cattle and sheep markets have on the whole been brisk. At Doune, the prices of both sheep and cattle were a little lower than at the Falkirk Tryst; but good lots brought fair prices. At All-Hallow Fair about 9000 cattle were shown, of which one half was sold the first day at prices 10 per cent. higher than those obtained at Doune. Four-year-olds of the Angus and Aberdeenshire breed, brought from £14 to £16; three-year olds, £10 to £12. Highland stots, three-year-old, realized from £9 to £12; two-year-old, £7 to £9. Fat cattle were scarce, and sold from 9s. to 9s. 3d. a stone.
